In one sense no reported case can ever be obsolete while the laws and judicial usages of English-speaking countries are what they are: that is, no man can say beforehand that any given case, however antiquated or trifling it may appear in itself to be, may not at some time have its use for the modern practitioner or text-writer. Every decision in the books is part of the history of the law, and no part of that history can be absolutely insignificant.—(Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart., LL.D., Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford.)

Accurate knowledge of the present state of the law upon any subject involves necessarily the history of the development of the law upon that subject, which can only be attained by following down the decisions touching upon it. — (Francis M. Scott, Justice, Supreme Court, New York.)

The law is the last interpretation of the law given by the last Judge.

The enunciation of the most elementary principle of law is frequently met by a demand for "an authority in support of that proposition . . . ." No time spent upon providing oneself with a precedent is ever wasted even though the book may have to be judiciously hidden from view until required.—(The Hon'ble Sir Cecil Walsh, Kt.,K.C., Ex-Offg., Chief Justice, Allahabad High Court.)

The last Judicial Interpretation of the law is the Law on which your case hangs.

To correctly appraise a Judicial decision, it is important to know later applications of its rules to varying states of facts by way of extension or qualification. —(S. Shepard, Chief Justice, Court of Appeal, Washington (U. S. A.).)

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

No prefatory note is required for this edition beyond the statement that copies of the second edition were exhausted quickly and the book has been out of stock for some time now. The subject yields to none in importance and there have been hundreds of decisions reported since the previous edition. All these have been incorporated in their proper places in this edition. A considerable amount of new matter has been added to the book which has also been revised thoroughly in the light of later decisions. The profession is quite familiar with the method of treatment in the A. I. R. Commentaries and it is not necessary here to explain it at any length. As in the second edition, the provisions of Order 34 of the Civil Procedure Code (relating to suits on mortgages) have been given along with commentaries in the Appendix. Mention may also be made of the glossary of words and phrases and also of the conveyancing forms given at the end of the third volume, along with other useful appendices.

The Authors have great pleasure in expressing their deep sense of obligation to the members of the Editorial Staff of the All India Reporter for their able and unstinting co-operation in the preparation of this edition.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT
ACT IV of 1882

CHAPTER V

OF LEASES OF IMMOVABLE PROPERTY.

Lease defined

105. A lease of immovable property is a transfer of a right to enjoy such property, made for a certain time, express or implied, or in perpetuity, in consideration of a price paid or promised, or of money, a share of crops, service or any other thing of value, to be rendered periodically or on specified occasions to the transferor by the transferee, who accepts the transfer on such terms.

Lessor, lessee, premium and rent defined

The transferor is called the lessor, the transferee is called the lessee, the price is called the premium, and the money, share, service or other thing to be so rendered is called the rent.

1. Applicability of Chapter.—The provisions of this Chapter apply to all leases[1] except agricultural leases.[2] In the case of agricultural leases, such provisions do not apply unless there is a notification by the Provincial Government making them applicable. (See S. 117.) In the absence of such notification therefore an agricultural lease will be governed by local laws and customs.[2a] But the principles underlying the provisions in this Act may also be applied as being rules of justice, equity and good conscience, when there is nothing in the local laws to make such principles inapplicable.[3]

The provisions of this Chapter do not apply to a lease of land granted by the Government, as the Crown Grants Act of 1895 expressly provides that this Act (Transfer of Property Act) does not apply to transfer of land of interests in land by or on behalf of the Crown.[8] (See also Preamble, Note 4.) But a 'municipality' is not outside the provisions of the Act and so a lease granted by a municipality is within this Chapter.[9] See also 117 and Notes thereunder.

2. Essentials of a lease.—The essentials factors of a lease under this section are—

(1) The right must be one as to 'immovable' propety. The section does not apply to a lease of any other property.

(2) The right must be that of the 'enjoyment' of immovable property. This includes the right to the 'possession of the property. (See Note 5.)

(3) There must be a transfer of such right.[1]

(4) The right transferred must be an 'interest' in the property. The grant of a merely personal right of enjoyment is not a lease.

(5) The transfer must be made for a certain time express of implied or in perpetuity.

(6) The transfer must be one for consideration.

(7) The consideration must be of the particular kind mentioned in the section, namely, premium or rent as defined by the section, either or both of them.

A lease being a transfer of an 'interest' in immovable property, it is a transfer of property within the meaning of S. 5 and so must comply with the requirements of that and other sections of the Act, so far as they may be applicable.[2]

The definition in this section applies only to leases under this Act. It does not apply to leases not governed by this Act, viz., (a) leases granted before the coming into force of this Act, (b) leases in places to which this Act is not applicable and (c) agricultural leases except when there is a Government notification making the provisions of this Chapter applicable.

In cases to which this Act applies, there will be no lease unless the essentials of the definition under this section are satisfied. But this does not affect the meaning to be attached to instruments for the purpose of the Registration Act and the Stamp Act. Those Acts contain a wider definition of the term "lease."[3] For instance, the Registration Act includes a kabuliat or an undertak-

Section 105—Note 2

1. Thus, the right of possession of a ryot holding under a zamindar is not one derived from the zamindar and so such ryot is not a tenant of the zamindar in the true legal sense of the term, though loosely called so in common practice. See Note 75.

2. As pointed out in S. 5, Note 5 the word "property" in that section is used in the most comprehensive sense and so there is no doubt that it covers the transfer of such an important right as the right of enjoyment of immovable property.

3. ('33) 20 AIR 1933 All 735 (737) : 55 All 874 : 145 Ind Cas 674 (FB), In the matter of Burma Shell Oil Storage & Distributing Co. of India Ltd. (Stamp Act.)

ing to occupy, as an instrument of lease. But such an instrument will not per se amount to a lease under this section as will be seen in Note 9. But the definitions in these special Acts relate only to procedural matters. They cannot affect the substantive law on the subject. In other words, an instrument which is not a lease under this section will not be effective to create an interest in property and confer a right of possession, though it may be regarded as a lease for the purpose of registration or stamp duty.

2a. "Immovable property," meaning of.—See Section 3, Note 2.—See also the case noted below.[1]

3. Lease is an interest in property.—The right of enjoyment contemplated by this section is an interest in the property.[1] Unless there is a transfer of such an interest there can be no lease.[2] The grant of a merely personal right of possession will not be a lease. It will only be a licence. (See Note 13.) Hence, where the agreement is not even to give a personal right of possession, there can be no question of a lease merely because one person agrees to pay an annual sum to another and such agreement has a collateral reference to a transaction which results in the property being transferred to the person by whom the money is agreed to be paid.[3] See also Note 4.

NOTE.—It may be noted that the section does not expressly state that a lease is a transfer of an interest in immovable property, and the transaction is defined as a transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property—Notwithstanding this, it is established that a lease is a transfer of an interest in immovable property.

A lease being an interest in immovable property, entitling the lessee to possession, a suit for ejectment against a lessee does not lie so long as the lease is in existence.[4] A merely personal right of possession under an agreement will not be in itself a good defence to such a suit.[4a]

As to whether a lease is a sufficient interest in the property to entitle the lessee to redeem a mortgage on the property, see S. 91, Note 12.

A lessee has a sufficient interest in the property to entitle him to apply under O. 21, R. 89 of the Civil Procedure Code to set aside a sale of the property in execution.[5] See also the A. I. R. Commentaries on the Civil Procedure Code, 4th (1944) Edition, O. 21 R. 89, Note 12.

Under the English law, a lease for a term is only what is known as a chattel interest and not a real interest, i.e., one corresponding to an interest in immovable property. This is not so under the Indian law,[6] as seen above.

4. Agreement to grant lease.—As seen in Note 3 a lease under this section is a transfer of an interest in immovable property. Hence, there must be a present demise to constitute a lease. A mere agreement to grant a lease in future will not be a lease.[1] Such an agreement will merely create a personal right and not an interest in the property. It is a matter of construction in each case whether the agreement is merely an executory one[2] or a present demise and creates an in-sad. (Raiyatnama executed by a person already in possession held to be only a collateral agreement and not a lease.)

terest in the property.[3] The mere fact that an agreement provides that the lease is to commence from a future date[4] or that there is a provision for the execution of a formal document[5] does not make it a merely executory agreement and not a lease. Even where possession is allowed to be taken under the agreement it may amount only to a personal agreement not creating any present interest in the property,[6] the right to take possession pending the grant of the lease being, in such cases, only a licence. But the circumstances of the case may show that apart from the lease that is agreed to be granted, there is another tenancy arising by implication from payment and acceptance of rent.[7]

A mere executory agreement for the grant of a lease under which the promisee enters into possession of the property is not by itself a good defence to a suit for ejectment against him by the owner.[7a] Under the doctrine of Walsh v. Lonsdale[8] such a person would be entitled to an equitable interest in the property. It has been held by the Privy Council[9] that this doctrine does not apply to India, but that if the owner sues for the ejectment of the intended lessee the latter can obtain a stay of the suit and sue for specific performance of the agreement to grant him a lease. (See Note 3 on S. 53A) Apart from this, in proper cases, the promisee under such agreement may be entitled to rely on S. 53A of the Act as a defence to the suit for ejectment.

An agreement for the grant of a lease though not an interest in the property, is an obligation annexed to the ownership of the property within the mean-

Further, he may be liable under the agreement for damages for breach of contract if he vacates the property before the end of period for which he has agreed to be in possession by paying rent.[12]

Registration Act.

Under the Registration Act. S. 2 (7), an agreement to lease is included within the definition of a lease. But it has been held by the Privy Council[13] that the definition only applies to an agreement which creates an interest in the property. Hence, there is practically no difference between the Registration Act and this Act so far as this proposition is concerned, namely, that a merely executory agreement to grant a lease is not a lease.

As to whether a counterpart, kabuliat, rent note, etc., are leases within the meaning of this section, see Note 9. They are leases under the Registration Act.

5. "Right to enjoyment".—The section defines a lease as the transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property. The fundamental conception of a lease is that it is the separation of the right of possession from ownership.[1] Though the section uses the word "enjoy" instead of the word "possess" there is no authority for holding that it contemplates the exclusion of possession when it refers to enjoyment. The word "enjoy" must, therefore, be taken to include possession also. The framers of the section do not seem to have intended to depart from the accepted and well-established connotation of lease in jurisprudence.

No doubt, S. 108 (b) which deals with the lessor's duty to put the lessee in possession of the property, is subject to the opening words of the section under which the parties can exclude the operation of any particular clause by express contract. But this only means that the lessor's duty of putting the lessee in possession can be excluded by express contract. It does not mean that the parties can agree that the lessee is to have no right of possession. If they do so, then the transaction would not be a lease. Hence, it is apprehended that the transfer of a mere right to the usufruct of the property without the right of possession will not be a lease.[2]

Since there is no valid lease unless the right of possession is granted to the lessee it follows that when a person has already granted a lease he cannot grant a fresh lease of the same property during the continuance of the previous lease. Such a lease has no effect and no rent can be recovered on its basis.[2a]

The word "enjoy" is, however, not used as the equivalent of "possess." The connotation of the word "possession" as used in the Act is distinct from "enjoyment" and does not necessarily include enjoyment. This is clear from Ss. 58 and 76 of the Act. Those sections show that though a usufructuary mortgagee is entitled to the possession of the mortgaged property, he is not entitled to the enjoyment of the property. Because, the usufruct of the property is treated as belonging not to the mortgagee but to the mortgagor. The mortgagee has only the right to receive such usufruct and reimburse himself for his debt from it. Under a lease, however, the usufruct of the property belongs to the lessee. The transfer of a bare right of possession without the right to the usufruct is not a lease.[3] Thus, the word "enjoy" seems to be used in the sense of the beneficial occupation of property. Such a meaning is not inconsistent with the literal sense of the word. Because, one of the meaning of this word is to occupy as a good or profitable thing.[4]

There must be a transfer of the exclusive right of possession of the leased property in order to constitute a lease.[5] (See Note 13.) The continuance in the transferor, after the transfer, of any share in the right of possession is detrimental to its character as a lease. This does not mean that there cannot be a lease of an undivided share in joint property. What is meant is that the transferor cannot reserve to himself any share in the right of possession.

2 NOTE.—At the same time, the mere fact that A is entitled to a share of the usufruct of property in the possession of B will not be sufficient to show that a relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the parties and that A is the landlord and B is the tenant—Thus, a zamindar's right in respect of the land in the occupation of ryots under him is said to be a right to a share of produce—But this does not prove the existence of the relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. See ('97) 20 Mad 299 (302, 303.)

The right to enjoy, spoken of in this section, is the right to enjoy the property in the manner in which it can be normally enjoyed. (See S. 108, cl. (o).) If the property is a coal or other mine it can only be enjoyed by working the mine. Such a right does not cease to be a lease merely because the mode of enjoyment results in the exhaustion of the property.[5]

A lease only connotes a right of possession. Actual entry on the land is not necessary to complete a lease. Where before taking a lease a person has already been in possession of the property in some other capacity, a formal surrender of possession by him to the lessor and a retransfer of it by the latter to the lessee is not necessary to constitute the relationship of lessor and lessee between them.[6a]

Under the present English law also (under the Law of Property Act of 1925) actual entry on the property is not necessary to complete a lease. But before the Act, the tenancy did not become complete until actual entry by the lessee on the property.[7] His interest in the property between the date of execution of the lease and actual entry into possession was known as interesse termini.

There is a rule of construction of documents under which a transfer of "rents and profits" of the land without any words of limitation is construed as a transfer of the land itself.[8] See also s. 8, Note 12. This is only a rule of construction adopted to find out the intention of the parties to a document. It does not mean that a transfer which on construction is ascertained to be intended only as a transfer of the usufruct of property is in law a transfer of the property itself. As seen above, such a transfer will not be a lease unless the right of possession is also transferred.

6. Lease and conveyance of interest in fee simple—Distinction. A lease of immovable property is only a transfer of the right of possession of such property. Although such a right is an interest in the property, it is distinct from the ownership thereof. As Salmond points out in his Jurisprudence, the ownership of property is only a particular kind of right in it.[1] Thus, the ownership of land denotes the right known under the English law as the fee simple in the land.[2]

But the ownership of property always carries with it the right of possession also. The right of possession, no doubt, can be separated and transferred to another person. This is what happens under a lease. But the moment it ceases to belong to any one else, it will automatically come back and vest in the person entitled to the ownership of the property. Hence, where the last holder of a lease dies intestate and without leaving any heirs, the owner of the property automatically gets back the right of possession. The right of possession does not pass by escheat to the Crown in such a case. The reason is that escheat takes place only when a thing does not belong to anybody. It is based on the maxim quod nullius est, est domini regis (that which belongs to no one belongs to the King.)[3] But so long as there is a person entitled to the ownership of the property it cannot be said that the right of possession of such property belongs to no one. Because, unless such a right is vested in some one else, it always belongs to the person entitled to the ownership of the property.

Where a right passes by escheat to the Crown, the integrity of the right is not in any way destroyed.[4] Hence, the Crown takes the right subject to all burdens which encumber it at the time of the escheat.[5] But when a reversion takes place on the death of the last holder of a lease, intestate and without leaving any heirs, the leasehold interest merges into the right of ownership and loses its integrity. Hence in such a case all interests to which the leasehold is subject at the time of reversion come to an end along with the leasehold.[6]

When the ownership or an interest in ownership is transferred, the right created is not a lease. Thus, a sale is the transfer of the ownership of property.[7] It is a transfer of the fee simple in the property, to borrow the language of the English law. Similarly, a mortgage connotes the transfer of an interest in the fee simple. A usufructuary mortgage includes not only a right of possession of the property but also an interest in the ownership of property.[8]

7. Contract necessary for lease.—As seen in Note 2 a lease is a "transfer of property" as contemplated by this Act. Hence as required by S. 5 it can only be effected by an act of a living person. A lease cannot be created by a will, as it is not a transfer within the meaning of S.5, the reason being that a will takes effect only from the death of the testator. (See S. 5, Note 3.) The requirement of consideration for a lease under this section shows that it can only be the outcome of a contract. Where there is no contract there can be no lease.[1] Merely because one person occupies another person's land a lease will not come into existence.[2] A mere demand of rent by the owner from the person in possession[3] or a mere offer of tenancy by the owner to such person[4] will not create a lease. Similarly, a co-owner occupying a specific portion of the common property does not ipso facto become a tenant of the rest, and is only liable to pay them their share of the profits but not rent unless there is an agreement to pay rent.[5] So also, an admission of a lease by the person in possession or by the owner will not by itself create a lease.[6] But an express contract of tenancy is not always necessary. The contract may be implied from the conduct of the parties and other circumstances of the case.[7]

4. NOTE.—The reason for this, it is conceived, is that escheat to the Crown takes place by the general prerogative of the Crown. The Crown has no pre-existing right in the property. As seen already, escheat takes place because the property belongs to no one. Hence, in such a case there is no question of any merger of a lesser right into a greater one with the consequence of the extinction of the lesser right.

When a lease is contained in writing it can be contained in more than one document.[8]

8. Tenancy by payment and acceptance of rent.—The mere fact that one person pays and another receives rent from the former does not necessarily create the relationship of landlord and tenant between them.[1] As seen in Note 7, such relationship can only arise on the basis of a contract between the parties. It is also necessary that there should be an intention to transfer an interest in the property. But payment and acceptance of rent will be an element of evidence going to prove the existence of a tenancy.[2] The sufficiency of such evidence for the purpose will depend on the circumstances of each case.[3] If for instance. the tenancy is for an agricultural or manufacturing purpose and is governed by this Act, then, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, it will be deemed to be one from year to year under s. 106. Such a lease cannot be created under s. 107 except by means of a registered instrument.[4] But if the tenancy is for any other purpose, then it will be deemed to be a tenancy from month to month under s. 106 and such a tenancy may be inferred from payment and acceptance of rent, provided that such payment and acceptance are sufficient, on the facts of the particular case, to prove an oral agreement of lease accompanied by delivery of possession. Even in the case of a tenancy for an agricultural or manufacturing purpose, the acceptance of rent is sufficient under s. 116 to cause a renewal of an expired lease if a tenant holds over after the expiry of such a lease and the landlord assents to his doing so. In cases not governed by this Act the payment and acceptance of rent may be sufficient to prove a tenancy even in regard to agricultural land, notwithstanding the presumption as to its being one from year to year.[5]

A tenancy can arise by implication from payment and acceptance of rent, only where the person, to whom the rent is paid, is the owner of the property.[6] Where a trespasser grants a lease of property and the owner accepts rent from the lessee, such acceptance will not amount to confirmation of the lease, the same being void and therefore incapable of confirmation or ratification.[7] But the creation of a fresh tenancy may be implied in such a case.[8]

9. Kabuliat, rent-note, etc., whether lease.—The word "transfer" necessarily imports that the act of transfer is to be made by the owner of the property.[1] Hence a kabuliat, rent-note or other similar document emanating from the transferee cannot by itself create a lease.[2] It can, however, evidence a lease,

11. Agreement varying rent or other terms of lease, whether lease —An agreement merely varying the amount of rent payable under an existing lease is not itself a lease.[1] Because, there is no fresh transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property in the lessee's favour in such a case. The agreement merely affects one of the terms on which the right of enjoyment already transferred to the lessee shall be exercised. A right to rent is, no doubt, a right in immovable property and an agreement varying the rent, therefore, will be one creating or limiting a right in immovable property.[1a] But such a right is that of the lessor and not of the lessee while there can be no lease unless a right is created in favour of the lessee. The same principle will be applicable to agreements involving a variation of other terms of a lease. So long as there is no fresh right of enjoyment transferred to the lessee the agreement will not itself be a lease.

Where the agreement enlarges either the property covered by the lease or the duration of the lease, it transfers a fresh right of enjoyment not included in the original lease and so will itself be a lease. So also, the variation in the terms of a lease may be of such a nature that it may lead to the conclusion that the agreement was intended to replace altogether the original lease. In such a case it must be held that the original lease has been given up and a fresh lease has been granted. On these principles it was held in the undermentioned cases[2] that the agreements in them were leases.

The question whether an agreement varying the rent or other terms of a lease requires registration is different from the question whether such agreement is a lease. Under s. 92 (4) of the Evidence Act where the original lease is by a registered document a subsequent oral agreement to vary the rent or other terms of the lease will be inadmissible in evidence. If the agreement varying the terms of a lease is embodied in a written instrument it may require registration under s. 17 (b) of the Registration Act although it does not amount to a lease. Thus, the right to rent is a right in immovable property. An agreement reducing or enhancing the rent payable under a lease will, therefore, be one limiting or creating a right in immovable property. Where such an agreement is contained in a written instrument it will require registration under s. 17 (b) of the Registration Act if the amount of rent reduced or enhanced is Rs. 100 or more.[3]

In Lalit Mohan Ghose v. Gopali Chauk Coal Co.,[4] the following question was referred to a Full Bench: "Does a document which is not a lease but which varies the amount of rent to be paid under existing registered lease as also the incidents of such payments, namely, the date of payment and consequences of default of payment, require registration?" The original lease in the case was a compulsorily registrable one under s. 107 of this Act and s. 17 (d) of the Registration Act. The Full Bench answered the question referred to it by stating that a document of the above kind was compulsorily registrable. The decision proceeds on the ground that the amount of rent, the time of payment thereof and consequences of default relate to essential incidents of a lease and that under s. 107, where a lease is of the kind requiring registration under that section, all its essential incidents must also be embodied in a registered document.

It may be questioned whether such a view does not involve an undue stretching of the language of s. 107. But the decision is clearly an authority for saying that an agreement merely varying some of the essential incidents of a lease is necessarily a lease.

12. Tenancy by acquiescence.—A's occupation of B's property does not ipso facto make A tenant of such property. The law requires special factors to bring into existence such a right. The acquiescence of the owner in such occupation is not, in itself, such a factor and by itself cannot create a tenancy.[1] But the acquiscence of B in A's entering into possession and enjoying B's property and doing various things on it will be relevant for the purpose of establishing a tenancy in two ways—

(1) the acquiescence may be evidence of a contract of tenancy which may be express or implied;[2]

(2) the acquiescence may preclude the owner on the principle of estoppel from denying the occupier's claim to be a tenant.[3]

It must depend on the facts of each case, whether there is such acquiescence on the part of the owner as to be sufficient for the occupier of property to rely on it in support of his claim of tenancy.

For a complete discussion of the principle of acquiescence applicable in such cases, see Note 22 on s. 51. See also Note 55.

13. Lease and licence compared—General principles.—A lease, inter alia, requires the two following essentials:

(1) There must be a transfer of the right of possession.

(2) Such right must be an interest in the property. If a merely personal right of possession is granted the right will not be a lease. (See Note 3.)

A licence differs from a lease in both the above points. Thus:

(1) A licence need not be a right of possession. It may be any right of user of the property. But it may be the right of possession also.

(2) A licence is a merely personal right and does not amount to an interest in property. Section 52 of the Easements Act expressly says this.

From the above the following propositions can be laid down:

(1) Where a right of possession is granted and such right amounts to an interest in the property, the right is a lease.

(2) Where a right of possession is not given but only a right of user not involving possession is granted and the right does not amount to an interest in the property, the right is a licence.

(3) Where a right of possession is granted but such right is not an interest in the property but only a personal right, the right is not a lease but a licence.

(4) Where a right of possession is not given but only a right of user not involving possession is given but the right amounts to an interest in the property, such right is neither a lease nor a licence. It is not a lease because the right of possession is not granted.[1] It is not a licence because the right amounts to an interest in the property.[2]

Under S. 60 of the Easements Act, a licence can be revoked by the grantor unless—

(a) it is coupled with a transfer of property and such transfer is in force;

(b) the licensee, acting upon the licence, has executed a work of a permanent character and incurred expenses in the execution.

But the mere fact that a licence is coupled with a transfer of property[3] or that it has become irrevocable will not make it a lease, unless the elements essential for a lease are present.

3. But see ('29) 120 Ind Cas 673 (673) (DB) (Lah), Pohuram v. Tabo. (NOTE.—An observation capable of the

As a licence does not create an interest in property, a licensee cannot sue in his own name in respect of the property.[4] Similarly, if he is ousted from the property by the owner, he cannot sue him for possession, unless it be under S. 9 of the Specific Relief Act.[5] So also, a licence is not, by itself, a good defence to a suit for ejectment by the owner.

Even if the licence has become irrevocable by the licensee executing work of a permanent character and incurring expenditure thereon, it will not in itself be a good defence. The reason is that a suit for ejectment is based on title and it is only a ground based on title, that will be a good defence to such a suit.[6] Prescription and estoppel will be good defences. But they stand on a special footing. Prescription is a form of title. Estoppel precludes the plaintiff from denying the title of the defendant. But though by itself a licence may not be a good defence to a suit for ejectment, it is conceived that the licensee may, on the principle laid down by the Privy Council in Ariff v. Jadunath,[7] obtain a stay of the suit and sue for an injunction against the owner restraining him from suing him for ejectment. The licensee can also sue for damages for wrongful revocation of the licence.[8]

Some decisions,[9] however, proceed on the footing that an irrevocable licence is a good defence to a suit for ejectment by the owner. It is submitted with respect that the view taken in them is not correct.

Some of them refer also to the ground of estoppel.[10] But it must be noted that the facts, which make a licence irrevocable, will not necessarily be sufficient to sustain a plea of estoppel or acquiescence. (For the nature of facts that will be necessary to sustain a plea of estoppel in such cases, see Note 22 on s. 51.)

Some of the other points of difference between a lease and a licence are:

(1) A licence may be granted without writing or registration, unless it is coupled with a transfer of an interest in immovable property. An instrument granting a licence does not require registration.[11] A lease can only be created by a registered instrument, if it is from year to year or for a period exceeding one year or if it reserves a yearly rent.

(2) No notice to quit is necessary to determine a licence and to bring a suit for ejectment against the licensee.[12] But unless a lease is determined by a due notice to quit or in any other recognised mode, the lessor cannot sue for ejectment against the lessee.

(3) A lease is morally a transferable right while a licence is not.[13]

(4) A lease is a heritable right while a licence is not.

(5) A lease is liable to forfeiture by denial by the lessee of the lessor's title. This principle does not apply to a licence.[14]

14. Lease or licence—Tests for determination.—The question whether a right is a lease or a licence according to the principles discussed in Note 13 is one of construction of the grant in each case. In construing such grants, the substance of the transaction must be considered and not merely the nomenclature used by the parties.[1]

The chief tests for determining whether a right is a lease or a licence are as follows:

(1) Where the right of possession is not granted but only a right of user not involving possession is granted, the right is only a licence.[2]

(2) Where the right of occupation is given but not the exclusive right of occupation, the right is only a licence. The reason is that a lease necessarily implies an exclusive right of possession of the leased property and is incompatible with the existence of any right of possession in the lessor.

(3) Where a right of exclusive possession is given, the right will normally be a lease, although there may be some reservations or restrictions as

On this part of the subject, the decisions[9] put the proposition somewhat like this: "If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder an exclusive right of occupation of the land, though subject to certain reservations or restrictions as to the purposes for which it may be used, it is in law a demise of the land itself."

9. See cases in foot-note (3).

This only means that the right of exclusive possession is prima facie a test of a lease and that where such right exists, it will be deemed to be a lease, unless there is sufficient reason to hold that only a personal right and not an interest in the property was intended to be granted.

In cases falling under the fourth class, the absence of an intention to grant an interest in the property may be gathered from the facts of the case. Thus, where there is an agreement to grant a lease coupled with a permission to occupy the property in the meanwhile, the permission clearly does not create an interest in the property and so is not a lease.[10] Similarly, it has been held that where a catering contract is given to a person and he is granted under the contract, the right to use certain rooms on the premises where the catering is to be done,such right is only a licence and not a lease.[11] So also, agricultural raiyats occupying house sites on the village abadi are only a kind of licensees and not lessees.[12] For other instances, see the undermentioned decisions.[13]

Note.—English decisions as to who is an occupier of property for purposes of rates, franchise, etc., illustrate typically the difference between a lessee and a mere licensee. An "occupier" may be treated as being in the position of a lessee. (See also Note 15.)

15. Occupation as lodger.—The question whether a person who occupies rooms in a building is a lodger or an occupying tenant, generally arises under the English law in cases relating to rates and franchise. If he is treated as a lodger, he is a licensee. If he is held to be an occupying tenant, he is a lessee.

The reason why a lodger is not a lessee but only a licensee is that he is not entitled to exclusive occupation. Though he is entitled to the exclusive use of certain rooms, the circumstances of his occupation show that for purposes of management, etc., the landlord retains control and possession of the property and that the lodger has only the use of the rooms.[1]

1. (1868) 3 Q B 350 (357) : 37 LJMC 73 : 18 L T 601 : 16 W R (Eng) 1059,

The question, whether a person is in the position of a lodger or a tenant, thus depends on whether he is entitled to exclusive possession of his rooms or not. This depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. In Bradley v. Baylis[2] Jessel, M. R., observed as follows:

> "I have been quite unable, so far as I am concerned, to frame an exhaustive definition (as to when a man may be said to occupy as an occupying tenant and when he is merely a lodger) . . . . . Some Judges have tried to do so, and, in my opinion, they have failed; and I think it wiser and safer to say that the question whether a man is a lodger, or whether he is an occupying tenant, must depend on the circumstances of each case."

The mere fact that the landlord lives on the premises will not be sufficient to hold that a person occupying rooms in the house is only a lodger and not a tenant.[3] See the undermentioned decisions[4] as to when the possession of such a person can be said to be exclusive and when not.

16. Occupation as tenant or servant.—Where a servant (or agent) of the owner occupies property on his behalf the occupation is in law that of the owner himself and so there is no lease.[1] There is neither a right to exclusive possession nor an interest in the property in such a case. Where a servant's occupation or residence in a house belonging to his master is required for the purpose of the service, such occupation is on the master's account. Hence, in such a case, the servant is not a tenant.[2] Where such residence or occupation is not required for the purpose of the service, the servant is not prevented from holding as a tenant.[3] But it does not necessarily follow that he holds only as a tenant.[4] The question is one of intention of the parties in each case.

This section recognises service as a form of rent. So, a lease in consideration of service to be rendered is valid. A servant, therefore, who is allowed to occupy the master's property in lieu of remuneration or as part remuneration for his service, may be a tenant. But it is not necessary that he should be one. The question depends on whether the right of exclusive possession is granted and whether an intention to create an interest in the property exists.[5] If these elements are present the servant will be a tenant and not a mere licensee,[6] though the occupation is to end on the termination of the service.[7] But if these elements are the part of the master, he is not prevented from occupying as a tenant.)

not present, the servant (or agent) will not be a tenant but only a licensee.[8]

Where an agreement is made between A and B that B should cultivate A's land and as his remuneration take a share of the share of the crops and there is no intention to grant B an interest in the land, the agreement is not a lease but a licence.[9]

17. Market rights.—Applying the general tests laid down in Note 14, if the grant of a right to hold a fair or a hat or a market on a piece of land gives the grantee the right of exclusive occupation of the land and there is no sufficient reason to hold that only a personal right and not an interest in the property was intended to be granted, the grant will amount to a lease. The undermentioned decisions fall under this principle.[1] But where the right of exclusive occupation is not given, the grant will only be a licence and not a lease.[2] Whether an exclusive right of occupation is given or not must be judged from the facts and circumstances of each case.

Persons who are allowed to sell articles in a market or on a road are not lessees but only licensees, because they are not entitled to an exclusive right of occupation of any particular spot.[3]

A person, to whom has been granted the right to collect licence fees from persons selling goods in the municipal market, is not a lessee but only a licensee.[4]

18. Agreement for cultivation of land, if lease.—An agreement for the cultivation of land under which a person is to cultivate another's land and the two are to share the produce in certain proportions may be a lease if there is an intention to transfer an interest in the property. But if there is no such intention such agreement cannot create a lease. The matter is one purely of construction in each case.[1] If there is no intention to transfer an interest in the property, the right will be a licence. See Note 13.

19. Possession under void lease—Effect.—A void lease can confer no title to possession. If the intended lessee enters into possession the property under a void lease he thereby does not get any interest in the property. The personal agreement implied in a void lease is not by itself a good defence to a suit for possession against the lessee by the lessor.[1] The reason is that a suit for ejectment is one based on title and only a ground of title can be a good defence to such a suit. A merely personal right cannot be a good defence to such a suit.

The mere fact that an owner sues for possession on the allegation that the defendant is his tenant (whose tenancy has expired) and it is found that the alleged tenancy is void or that the lease-deed is inadmissible in evidence does not disentitle the plaintiff to a decree for possession where he is otherwise entitled to such decree.[2]

A lessee in possession may, however, be entitled to sue for specific performance of the contract to grant a lease which is implicit in the void lease.[3] Even where such a contract is required to be, but has not been, registered, S. 27A of the Specific Relief Act confers on the lessee the right of suing for specific performance.

Besides this, a lessee in possession may also be entitled to resist the suit for possession by the lessor on the ground of part performance under S. 53A if the conditions contemplated by that section exist.[4]

The lessee may, also be entitled to resist the lessor's suit on equitable grounds, such as estoppel, etc. For a discussion of these principles, see Notes 12, 20 and 55.

It may be noted here that the English doctrine of part performance or the principle of equity laid down in Walsh v. Lonsdale[4a] has no application to cases under this Act. Section 53A differs from the English doctrine of part performance in many respects. See Notes on section 53A.

Notwithstanding the invalidity of the lease, the tenant in possession will have a good title except against the true owner on the well-known principle that possession is a good title against the whole world except the true owner.[5]

A lessee in possession under a void lease will also be in the position of a licensee[6] and not a mere trespasser if the lease has been granted by the true owner and the lessee has entered with the owner's consent. As to the rights of a licensee in possession, see Note 13.

A person who has entered under a void lease is not liable for rent.[7] But he may be liable for compensation for use and occupation.[8] He will not be liable for mesne profits where the lease has been granted by the true owner and the lessee has been let into possession by such owner. Because in such a case possession will not be wrongful. But where the invalidity of the lease is due to its having been granted by a person not entitled to the property, the lessee will be liable for mesne profits.[9] In some cases, the lessee may be liable for the amount payable as rent under the void lease, as damages for breach of contract, when such contract is provable under the law.[10]

Notwithstanding the invalidity of the lease, the possession of the property coupled with the payment and acceptance of rent and other circumstances may be sufficient to establish by implication a contract of tenancy between the parties.[11] (See also Note 8.)

The intended tenant may also prescribe by adverse possession for a title to a tenancy. See Note 82.

Registration.

Where there is an instrument which fulfils the definition of a lease either under the Registration Act or this Act and is compulsorily registrable but is not registered it will not be admissible in evidence (under S. 49 of the Registration Act) to prove the lease or the terms of the lease. But such instrument may be admissible in evidence in a suit for specific performance of the contract to grant a lease or for the purposes of S. 53A of this Act. Such an instrument will also be admissible in evidence to prove any collateral transaction which does not require to be registered. Thus, the instrument may be admissible in evidence to prove the nature of the lessee's possession and to show that it is not under any claim of ownership.[12] The matter sought to be proved must be distinct from the transaction embodied in the instrument, and must not require registration. Thus, in the above instance, the giving of possession to the lessee would be a transaction distinct from the granting of the lease (which would be complete by the execution of the instrument of lease[12a]), and would not require registration. The intention of the parties in giving and taking possession would thus relate to a collateral matter not requiring registration. Similarly, an independent oral agreement of lease may be proved by the unregistered instrument.[13] So also, the rent fixed in the unregistered instrument may be referred to for determining what would be fair and reasonable compensation for use and occupation.[14] But where the agreement between the parties as to the letting is contained in the instrument and there is no independent contract of letting, it is not open to the parties to fall back upon the original agreement, if it is found that the instrument is not admissible in evidence.[15] For other instances see the cases noted below.[16]

20. Who can grant a lease.—Section 7 shows that the following conditions are necessary to entitle a person to transfer property—

(1) he must be the owner of the property or must be authorised to transfer such property;

(2) he must be competent to contract;

(3) he can transfer only in the circumstances, to the extent and in the manner allowed and prescribed by any law for the time being in force.

The above principles are applicable to leases also as they are transfers of property. Thus, a person who is neither the owner of property nor authorised to transfer it cannot grant a lease of it.[1] (See also Note 21.) On the same principle a person cannot grant a lease so as to outlast his own interest in the property. Thus, a sub-lease will not be valid after the expiry of the main lease.[1a] So also, a minor not being competent to contract cannot grant a lease. (See Note 22.) The third requirement referred to above is a matter depending on the particular provisions of law that may be applicable in each case. For illustrations of such provisions reference may be made to the Notes on section 7.

The requirements set forth above are subject to various equitable principles of a general nature. The results of some of these principles may be formulated as follows:

(1) The grantor of a lease cannot dispute its validity on the ground of his own want of title to the property. This is apart from any question of estoppel under S. 115 of the Evidence Act. So even if the grantee knew about the want of title of the grantor, the latter will not be entitled to dispute the validity of the grant. The principle is based on the maxim that no man can take advantage of his own wrong.[2]

(2) Where the grantor has, by express or implied representation, induced the grantee to believe that the facts necessary to make the grant of a lease valid exist, and the grantee has accepted the grant under such belief, the grantor will be estopped under S. 115 of the Evidence Act from denying such facts. But this principle does not apply to representations as to competency to contract.[3] Nor does the principle of estoppel apply to a matter of pure law where both parties are aware of the material facts, as no estoppel can arise from ignorance of law, which both parties must be presumed to know.[4]

(3) Under the doctrine known as feeding the grant by estoppel, where a person not being entitled to any interest in the property professes to grant a lease of it and subsequently acquires an interest in the property, the lease will operate on such interest.[5] For further information on this principle, see the Notes on section 43.

Unless any such established principle of equity applies to the case, a lease which does not satisfy the requirements of S. 7 will be void and no effect, even as against the grantor.

Where a lease has been granted by a trespasser and the owner accepts rent from the tenant such acceptance will not amount to a confirmation of the lease.[6]

Because, in such cases, the lease will be void and incapable of ratification or confirmation. The same principle will apply also to cases where a person with a limited interest in property grants a lease for a period exceeding his own tenure in the property. Thus, where a life-tenant grants a permanent lease, the sub-lease will be void against the superior landlord after the death of the life-tenant and the landlord cannot ratify it by mere acceptance of rent from the tenant inducted by the life-tenant.[7] But in all such cases acceptance of rent by the owner from the person inducted on the land may give rise to an inference of a fresh tenancy by implication[8] on the principles discussed in Note 8.

A lease by a Hindu widow in excess of her powers is not void after her death. It is only voidable by the reversioner who can, at his option, ratify the lease or repudiate it.[9] Hence, in such a case the acceptance of rent from the tenant by the reversioner will amount to a ratification of the lease by the widow.[10]

Where a Hindu reversioner is entitled to avoid a transfer by a widow he need not get the transfer set aside through Court. He can treat it as a nullity and sue for possession. This, however, does not mean that the transfer is void. Because, as seen above, he can ratify the transfer, which will not be possible if the transfer was void.[11]

It has been held that a stanamdar in Malabar is entitled to grant a lease for a term exceeding his own lifetime so as to make it binding on his successor provided the lease is beneficial to th estate.[12]

As to leases by minors see Note 22. As to the power of a mortgagor to grant leases, see S. 65A and Notes thereon.

21. Lease by de facto proprietor.—As section 7 provides, a transfer of property can only be made by a person who is entitled to it or who is authorised to transfer it. The mere fact that a person is in possession of a certain immovable property will not therefore entitle him to grant a lease of the same when he is not otherwise entitled to do so.[1] And a tenant inducted by such a person can be evicted by the true owner without notice. But such a lessee will have a good title as against persons other than the owner and his privies.[2]

The view is sometimes expressed that a person inducted on land as tenant by a de facto owner of the property who has no title to it is entitled to the tenancy even as against the true owner where both the grantor and grantee have acted in good faith.[3] The view purports to be based on the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Binad Lal v. Kalu.[4] But it is submitted that that ruling does not justify any such broad proposition which would so materially reduce the applicability of the general principle already stated, namely, that a person cannot confer a title to anything to which he himself has no title. The decision merely proceeds or the construction of S. 5, Sub-s. (2) of the Bengal Tenancy Act and holds that a person let into cultivating possession by a de facto proprietor without title is a raiyat within the meaning of that section. The decision does not support the proposition that in every case in which there is a bona fide letting by a trespasser who is in possession of an estate without title. the tenancy would be binding on the true owner. There is no doubt, a reference in the judgement to the fact of bona fides. But this is only by the way and is not the legal ground on which the decision is based.

22.—Lease by or in favour of a minor.—A lease is a transfer of property and as such is governed by S. 7. Hence, a minor, being a person not competent to contract, cannot grant a lease. A lease granted by a minor would be void.[1] He cannot even ratify it on attaining majority, by acceptance of rent or otherwise.[2] But where the lease has been granted by the guardian of a minor in excess of his authority, the lease is not void and the minor can ratily it on attaining majority.[3]

Though a lease by a minor is void, it has been held that the Court has power on general principles of equity to require the consideration paid by the lessee to be refunded before he is ejected from the property.[4]

As seen in Note 8 on S. 7 a transfer of property in favour of a minor is not void.[5] But where a lease in favour of a minor contains covenants to be performed by him it has been held that the lease would be invalid.[6]

The above view proceeds on the ground that in such cases, the covenants being void under S. 11 of the Contract Act, the lease also would be void for want of consideration. The reasoning will not apply where the lease has been granted in consideration of a premium paid in a lump sum and there is no outstanding covenant to be performed by the lessee.

In Raghavachariar v. Srinivasa Raghava' Sreenivasa Iyengar, J., points out the distinction between cases in which the transfer is in consideration of certain promises or covenants and those in which the property transferred is itself burdened with certain liabilities, as for instance, the liability to pay taxes. The transfer in favour of a minor would be void in the former case but not in the latter case.

23. Lease of untransferable property.—A lease being a transfer of property, a valid lease implies that the property leased is transferable under the law. Section 6 provides that property of any kind may be transferred except as otherwise provided by this Act or any other law for the time being in force. If therefore a property is not transferable under the law it cannot be leased. Reference may be made to S. 6 and the Notes on it as regards the transferability of various kinds of property. Where a lease covers both transferable and untransferable properties but is separable as regards the two kinds of properties, it will be valid with regard to the transferable items. Thus, a lease of temple lands is not wholly invalid simply because the lessee is empowered under the terms of the lease also to manage the temple affairs, the transfer of the right of management being clearly separable from the lease of the land.[1] See also Note 20.

24. Commencement of lease.—Section 5 expressly defines a transfer of property as a conveyance of property in present or in future. Hence a lease which is to commence at a future date is valid.[1] But there must be an actual conveyance or present demise and not a mere agreement to convey in future. (See Note 4.)

Under S. 110 where no day is fixed for the commencement of a lease, it commences from the making of the lease.[1a] The mere fact that rent is fixed according to the Bengali year does not mean that the tenancy is to commence from the beginning of the Bengali year and not the date of the lease.[2]

English law.

(1) Under the English law, the lease must fix a date from which it is to begin. This is not necessary under this section.

(2) Under the English law a lease to commence more than 21 years after the date of the instrument is void. There is no such limit under this Act.[3]

25. "Certain time."—One of the requisites of a valid lease is that it must be granted for a certain time express or implied or in perpetuity.[1] Thus, a provision as to the period of the lease is an essential part of a lease. But the period may be express or implied. Further a provision implied by law or usage will be sufficient for the purpose.[2] This follows from S. 106 which provides that in the absence of a contract or local law or usage to the contrary a lease will be deemed to be one from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the lease.[2a]

A lease, however, need not be for a period which is certain on the date of the lease. It is sufficient if the period is fixed with reference to a future event on the happening of which the lease will be determined and the period of the lease will become certain, although on the date of the lease it may not be possible to say when such event will happen.[3] Thus, the word "certain" in the section means really certain or capable of being made certain at a future date.[4]

This is quite clear from the other provisions of this Chapter. For instance, Ss. 106 and 107 refer to leases from year to year. Section 108, clause (i) refers to a lease of uncertain duration.[4a] So also S. 111, clause (b) refers to the period of a lease being limited conditionally by the happening of a certain event. All these provisions show that the period of a lease need not be certain on the date of the lease. It is sufficient if the period is fixed (by actual contract or by implication of law) in such a way that it can be made certain at a future date.

On this principle a lease for the life-time of the lessee will be a valid lease, because the period of the lease will become certain on the tenant's death.[5] Similarly, it has been held that a lease for the duration of the world war of 1914 was valid.[6]

So also, a lease to continue during the existence of certain institutions will be valid.[7] For other instances, see the undermentioned cases.[8]

But where the future event with reference to which the period of a lease is fixed is of so uncertain a character that it would be impossible to say at any time whether such event has happened or not, the period will not be certain. Thus, it was held by the Bombay High Court that a lease, till the lessor provided other suitable land to the lessee was, in the circumstances of the case, uncertain as to the period of the lease and was therefore void.[9] The reason was that the lease did not provide any method for determining the suitability of the land.[10] Even where the parties have intended the lease to go on indefinitely and have not laid down any limit of time for the lease either absolutely or relatively as above described, it cannot be said that the lease is for an uncertain time so as to become void under the section. Because, in such a case, the lease is ordinarily construed as being one for the lifetime of the lessee. (See Note 26.)

Where the lease is to go on indefinitely but subject to the liability of being put an end to at any time or at the end of any year or month or similar period, the term of the lease is fixed with reference to the future event which will terminate the lease and is not uncertain for the purpose of this section. Nor is the lease in such a case one for an indefinite period, as such period is defined though not certain immediately. A lease from month to month or year to year will fall under this category. (See Note 26.) A tenancy at will is also a lease of this type. (See Note 32.)

The section does not prescribe any minimum period of time for which a lease can be granted. Thus, a lease for a day would be valid.[11] Similarly, a tenancy at will would be a valid lease under the section, the term in such a case being fixed with reference to the exercise of will by either party which will terminate the lease. (See Note 32.)

25a. Concurrent lease.—See Section 108 cl. (1), Note 10.

26. Term of lease—Mode of determination.—A lease is the outcome of a contract. Hence the period of the lease is to be determined with reference to the contract between the parties in each case. But a provision as to such period need not be express. It may be implied. Further, such a provision may be implied by law or usage. In the absence of a contract, or local law or usage to the contrary, a lease will be deemed under S. 106 to be one from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the lease.

In construing a lease with reference to the period for which it has been granted the following principles must be noted :

(1) A lease need not fix a definite period in terms of years, months and days as the term. Similarly, a lease need not fix a particular year, month and day in the future as the time, up to which the lease is to run. In other words, it is not necessary that on the date of the lease, it must be possible to foretell definitely how long the lease is to continue. It is sufficient if the term of the lease is fixed with reference to a future event on the happening of which the lease will come to an end and the term thereof will become certain. It is immaterial that on the date of the lease, the time when such event will happen is not certain. (See Note 25.)

(2) Where the parties have not fixed any term either absolutely or relatively as above described but have shown their intention that the lease is to go on indefinitely, the rule of construction discussed in Note 72 will apply. This rule shows that a lease for an indefinite period is ordinarily to be construed as enuring at least for the lifetime of the lessee.[1]

(3) The above rule of construction will not apply where the term of the lease has been fixed or can be definitely ascertained. As already seen, such term may be fixed absolutely or relatively. It may be fixed expressly or impliedly. It may be implied, for instance, from the nature and purpose of the lease, the manner in which rent has been reserved and other circumstances. Thus, the fact that a yearly rent is reserved may show that the tenancy is one from year to year.[2] But the test is not a conclusive one.[2a] In some cases, though a yearly rent is reserved, the lease may be held to be merely a tenancy at will.[3] In either case, however, the term of the lease is fixed. It is fixed with reference to a future event. This future event is the act by which the tenancy is terminated by either party under the option which he has under the lease. The above illustrations show that the mere fact that the duration of a lease is dependent on the will of the parties does not make it a lease under which a term is not fixed. In such cases, the lease is intended to go on indefinitely till it is determined by a valid notice or otherwise at the option of the parties. The termination of the lease is made to depend entirely on the will of the parties. Still, the above rule of construction cannot be invoked in such cases. It cannot be held that such a lease enures for the lifetime of the grantee.

(4) Even where the future event with reference to which the term of a lease is fixed is uncertain in character and it cannot be said at any time whether such event has occurred, it must be held that the parties have fixed a term of the lease. In such a case, the lease will be void for uncertainty.[4] It cannot be treated as a lease for the lifetime of the lessee by invoking the above rule of construction. Nor can such a lease be held to be one from year to year or month to month under S. 106. Because, there is a "contract to the contrary" in such a case.

(5) Suppose a lease is intended to go on indefinitely and no term is fixed therefor, (absolutely or relatively) but that there is sufficient reason, on the construction of the lease, to hold that it is intended to confer a hereditary interest. Such a lease will not be treated as one for the lifetime of the lessee. It will virtually be one in perpetuity. (See Note 72.)

From the above discussion, it follows that wherever it is possible to gather clearly the intention of the parties as to the duration of a lease, there will be no room for the application of the presumption under S. 106. It is immaterial whether the parties have fixed a limit of time (absolutely or relatively) for the lease or have intended the lease to go on indefinitely. In either case, the term of the lease will be determined in accordance with the principles discussed above and not according to the presumption under S. 106.

27. Lease entitling lessee to hold as long as he pays rent or as long as he may wish.—There is a conflict of decisions as to the construction of leases, under which the lessee is entitled to hold as long as he pays rent or performs other obligation under the lease. It is conceived that a lease, under which the lessee would be entitled to hold as long as he requires the property or wishes to have the property, would also fall under the same class. There would be no difference in principle, it seems, between the two classes as regards the determination of their nature from the point of view of duration. In either case, it would be within the power of the lessee to put an end to the lease at any time he thinks fit without reference to the lessor. Hence the two classes of cases have been considered together in this Note. The decisions fall under the following classes:

(1) Such a lease is a permanent and heritable one.[1]

(2) Such a lease is one for the life of the lessee.[2] This is the view generally adopted. The reason given is that the continuation of the lease depends on the will of the lessee which cannot be exercised after the lessee's death.[3]

(3) Such a lease is one for a period exceeding one year and requires registration.[4] This view is consistent with (1) and (2) above.

(4) Such a lease is not one for a term exceeding five years within the meaning of the proviso to S. 17, sub-s. (1) of the Registration Act.[5] This view is consistent with the view in (5) below.

(5) Such a lease is a tenancy at will.[6] The reason given is that such a lease is really a tenancy at the will of the lessee, which, by implication of law, is a tenancy at the will of both the parties.[7]

It is submitted with respect that the view taken in classes 1 and 2 above does not appear to be sound. The view involves the position that the lessee cannot by his own independent will terminate the lease. Because, a lease for life or permanent lease cannot, normally, be put an end to in this way. No doubt, S. 111 includes surrender as one of the modes of terminating a tenancy, and this is applicable to leases for life and permanent leases also. But the surrender referred to in S. 111 is one based on the mutual agreement of the parties. This result, viz., that the lessee cannot leave even if he wants to unless the lessor agrees to his doing so, is obviously against the intention of the parties in such cases.

It seems that the view of the decisions under class (5) is the correct view.

Considered purely with reference to the intention of the parties, it seems to be clear that a lease of the kind in question here is one at the will of the lessee. Under English law, a tenancy expressed to be at the will of the lessee is, by implication of law, one at the will of the lessor also. As pointed out by the Madras High Court in Manicka v. Chinnappa[8] there seems to be no reason why this principle should not be followed in India also. It seems to be based on common sense and quite in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience.

The decisions under class (4) are consistent with this view.

It is conceived that on the principles discussed in Note 26 the rule, that a lease for an indefinite period will be regarded prima facie as a lease for the lifetime of the grantee, will not apply to the kind of leases under discussion here.[9] The reason is that in such cases, the term of the lease is not indefinite but fixed by the lease. The term is fixed with reference to a future event, such as the discontinuance of the payment of rent by the lessee, which will terminate the lease.

It is a question of construction in each case, whether the lessee is entitled to hold as long as he pays the rent or as long as he wishes or requires the property. An agreement by the lessor not to raise the rent, so long as the lessee kept the premises, does not imply that the lessee is to be entitled to keep the premises as long as he wishes.[10] Similarly, where a tenant takes up a property under an agreement that he would pay the assessment, this does not imply that he would be entitled to keep the property so long as he pays the assessment.[11]

See also the undermentioned decision.[12]

28. Lease for indefinite period—Construction of.—See Notes 26 and 72.

29. Lease for a term certain with a provision for continuation thereafter.—Suppose, a lease is granted for a term certain with a provision that after the expiry of the term the lessee shall be entitled, at his option, to continue to hold for a further period. It is the general view that such a lease is only for the term fixed and the further period is not to be counted as a part of the term.[1] The reason is that in such cases, the actual demise is to be regarded as being only for the term fixed and the provision as to the future as only entitling the lessee, at his option to a renewal of the tenancy.[2]

Where, the right of the lessee to continue in possession after the expiry of the term fixed is subject to the concurrence of the lessor, it is clear, on the above principle, that the lease is to be treated only as one for the period fixed.[3]

But it seems that the above is only a rule of construction. Where it is clear from the provisions of a lease that the intention is to confer a further interest on the lessee in continuation of the interest created in the first instance and not merely an option of obtaining a renewal of the lease, the lease will be one for a period exceeding that fixed therein as the primary term.[4]

In the decisions noted below[5] where a lease was granted for a period of years and contained a provision that the lessee might continue in possession thereafter as long as he performed the conditions of the lease, it was held that the lease conferred a life-interest on the lessee. Such a lease will be one for the period fixed as the term.[2]

Under S. 110 where a lease is expressed to be terminable before the expiration of the period fixed by it, and the lease omits to mention at whose option it is to be so terminable, the lessee and not the lessor shall have such an option.

31. Periodic leases.—A reference to S. 106 will show that it refers to two forms of leases, the lease from year to year and that from month to month. There are similar leases under the English law also.[1] Such leases may be conveniently called periodic leases.

The following are the essential elements of such leases:

(1) The lease must be intended, normally,[2] to go on indefinitely, till it is terminated by either the lessor or the lessee.[3]

(2) The termination contemplated must be by a notice which satisfies certain requirements. These requirements are[4]—

(a) In the case of a lease from year to year, the notice must be at least of six months and must expire with the end of a year of the tenancy.

(b) In the case of a lease from month to month, the notice must be at least of 15 days and must expire with the end of a month of the tenancy.

From the above, the following propositions emerge:

(1) A periodic lease can be terminated in any year or month of the tenancy, as the case may be, by a notice which fulfils the requirements above-mentioned.

(2) Such a lease cannot ordinarily be terminated in any other manner.[5]

Both the above elements are necessary to make a lease one from year to year or one from month to month. If either of such elements is wanting, the lease will not be a periodic lease.

NOTE.—Section 106 does not define a lease from year to year or from month to month and the provision as to notice contained in the section is not given as a part of the definition of such leases; it is conceived, that such a provision lays down an essential element of such leases for the purpose of the Act.

5. ('28) 112 Ind Cas 651 (652) (Lah), Muhammad Budha v. Ghulam Qadir.

As regards the first element.—If the lessor or lessee cannot determine a lease by simply giving a notice which fulfils the above requirements, the lease will not be a periodic lease.[6] Thus, a lease till the lessor provides "other suitable land" to the lessee and the expiry of six months from the time when the lessor does so, is not a lease from year to year.[7] The reason is that the lessor cannot determine the lease by giving notice in any year of the tenancy. He can only do so after he has provided other suitable land.

As regards the second element.—If a lease can be determined without notice, it will not, ordinarily, be a periodic lease.[8] Thus, a lease which can be terminated by the lessor at any time is a tenancy at will and not a lease from year to year, although an annual rent may be reserved under the lease.[9] Where a notice is not required to determine a tenancy, the mere fact that it is determinable only at the end of a year or month of the tenancy will not make it a lease from year to year or from month to month.[10]

Suppose, a lease requires a notice for its determination. Even then, the lease will not be a periodic lease, if the notice required is not one which is of the kind described above. Thus, take for instance, a lease which provides that it is determinable at 15 days' notice. The lease will not be one from month to month,[11] unless it is provided that the notice must expire with the end of a month of the tenancy.

Whether a lease is one from year to year or from month to month is a question of construction of the lease in each case.[12] The mere fact that the rent is fixed on an annual basis will not necessarily show that a lease is one from year to year.[13]

('21) 8 AIR 1921 Lah 96 (96) : 60 Ind Cas 226, Mangal Singh v. Atra. (Lease fixing a monthly rent but rent made payable annually—Lease held to be a monthly one.)

A lease from year to year or month to month is a single lease for the whole period till it is determined.[14] Such a lease is not a succession of distinct leases each for a year or month as the case may be.[15] There is no re-letting at the beginning of each successive period.[16] The lease is at least for one year or one month so that the lease can be terminated by notice expiring with the end of the second year or second month of the tenancy as the case may be.[17]

Under S. 106, in the absence of a contract, local law or usage to the contrary, a lease for an agricultural or manufacturing purpose will be deemed to be one from year to year and a lease for any other purpose will be deemed to be one from month to month.

32. Tenancy at will.—A tenancy at will has been defined as arising "when a person lets to another to hold at the will of the lessor or the person letting. The lessee or the person taking the lands is called a tenant at will and as he may be turned out when his landlord pleases, so he may leave when he likes."[1] Hence, where a lessor has the option of determining a lease at any time he thinks fit and there is no other limit of time for the lease, the lease will be a tenancy at will.[2] In such cases, the law gives the lessee also the right of determining the

A tenancy at will cannot arise by presumption under S. 106.[3] When there is no provision as to the duration of a tenancy, it will be presumed to be one from year to year or month to month according to the purpose of the tenancy and not a tenancy at will. But an intention to create a tenancy at will may be implied and need not be express.[4] It will depend on the facts a tenancy and circumstances of each case whether the intention of the parties has been to create a tenancy at will.[5] Where such a tenancy arises expressly or impliedly, the presumption under S. 106 will not be applicable, such presumption only arising when there is no contract or local law or usage to the contrary.

A tenancy at will being an interest in property like any other lease, it must be determined before the lessor can sue for the ejectment of the tenant from the property.[6] As in such cases, the contract itself implies that the lease can be put an end to at any time, a notice is not necessary for its determination. simply communicating to the lessor his intention to give up the lease and actually vacating the property.[8]

The difference between a notice to quit and a demand of possession is this. Notice to quit contemplates the giving of a certain time to the lessee within which he has to leave. But a demand of possession does not require any time to be given to the lessee for vacating. The demand may be for vacating the property immediately. The idea of notice may also involve the reasonableness or otherwise thereof both with regard to the length of the notice as well as to the time at which the notice is to expire.[9] Sometimes the law itself lays down the limits for these matters (e. g., S. 106). But though a notice to quit is not necessary to terminate a tenancy at will, such a notice (by the lessor) will be sufficient to terminate it.[10] In the undermentioned case,[11] though the lease provided that it was to be terminable by the lessor at his option, at any time, by giving 15 days' notice, it was held that the lease was a tenancy at will. It will be remembered that a periodic lease like a lease from year to year cannot ordinarily be determined without a valid notice.

It is sometimes said that a tenancy at will is not a lease under this section.[12] The reason given is that such a lease is not for a certain time express or

NOTE.--Topham in his New Law of Property, 4th Edn., 1932, p. 252, says that a tenancy at will is determinable by lessor or lessee by notice. He does not say that a simple demand of possession by the lessor will not be sufficient to determine the tenancy.

implied.[13] It is difficult to appreciate this reason.[14] As seen in Note 25 the term of a lease can be fixed with reference to a future event, though it may not be possible to say on the date of the lease, when such event will occur. It is not clear why the act by which the lessor or the lessee may manifest his intention to terminate the lease should not be considered as the event, with reference to which the term of the lease is fixed in such cases.

No doubt, It is considered that a tenancy at will is not a heritable[15] or transferable interest.[3] But this does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that a tenancy at will is not a lease at will. It is conceived that the above features of such tenancies are only the result of the presumed intention of the parties in such cases. The intention being to create an interest whose continuance is to depend on the will of the parties, it is apparently considered (as it may be very reasonably considered), that the intention is that such interest should be confied in its enjoyment to the grantee personally and should neither be heritable nor transferable. Section 108, clause (j), under which a lease is transferable, is expressly made subject to there being no contract or local usage to the contrary. It is clear that such a contract may be express or implied. A tenancy at will may be regarded as containing such an implied provision against transfer. The non-transferable nature of a tenancy at will may thus be only the result of such an implied contract. There does not seem to be anything in principle against parties agreeing that a tenancy at the lessor's will should be a heritable and transferable interest. As an instance of a lease which, though terminable at any time at the will of the lessor, was held to be both heritable and transferable, reference may be made to the case of Lekhraj Roy v. Kunhya Singh.[17] (See Note 72.)

A tenancy at will is not a lease for a period exceeding one year for purposes of registration.[18]

It will be noticed that a tenancy at will is not a lease for an indefinite period, under which no term is fixed, so as to attract the rule of construction discussed in Note 26, viz., that a lease for an indefinite term enures, generally speaking, for the life-time of the lessee.

34. Lease for life.—A lease for the life of the lessee would be a valid lease under this section. Though on the date of the lease the period of such a lease is not certain, it will become certain on the death of the lessee and this is enough for the purpose of the requirement as to certainty under this section. (See Note 25.)

The general rule of construction of leases is that where the parties have indicated their intention that the lease is to go on indefinitely but have not fixed any term for the lease, either absolutely or with reference to a future event, the lease is ordinarily to be regarded as one for the life of the grantee, unless there are some words showing an intention to grant a hereditary interest. (See Note 26.)

An estate granted to A for life with remainder to A's son is different from a hereditary estate granted to A. In the former case, an interest is conferred by the grant on A's son. But in the latter case, A's son gets no interest in the property under the grant.[1]

But it must be noted that there cannot be a lease for life in favour of A with remainder to A's son. Where there is a lease, a reversion to the lessor's estate is essential. Otherwise, the transaction would not be a lease. But there can be a lease to A for his life with a lease over to his son on the death of A. In such a case, A's son is not entitled to a remainder. He is only entitled to a leasehold interest. After the determination of his interest, the property will revert to the lessor.

A lease granted for the life of two persons enures till the death of the survivor of them.[2]

A lease for life is regarded as one for a period exceeding one year for the purpose of registration, although on the date of the lease it is not certain whether the life will expire only after a year from the commencement of the lease.[3]

35. Lease with a clause for renewal—General.—A provision in a lease to the effect that on the expiry of the term of the lease, the lease is to be renewed is a valid provision. Such a provision, however, does not ipso facto extend the term of the lease. The provision only entitles the lessee to obtain a new lease in his favour after the expiry of the original term.[1] Where the lessee dies

If time was of the essence of the contract the lessee must exercise the option before the expiry of the lease; but if time was not of essence of the contract he can exercise the option within a reasonable time even after the expiry of the lease.[2a] Where a term of the lease was that : "After the expiration of the said term, if the lessee shall so desire, the executant shall have no objection whatever to renew the lease for a further term of 20 years," it was held that time was not of the essence of the contract and that it was only obligatory upon the lessee to require a renewal to be granted to him within a reasonable time after the expiration of the original lease.[2b] Where the execution of the fresh lease is dependent on a re-assessment at the instance of the lessor, it is for the lessor to make the re-assessment and then call upon the tenant to exercise his option. In such a case the lessor is bound to give notice to the lessee for exercising the option of renewal before he can treat the lease as determined and re-enter on the land.[2c] Where the lessor bound himself to give the lessee such leases as he might require from time to time after the expiry of the original lease on the same conditions and the lessee did not call upon the lessor to execute a fresh lease until eight years after the expiry of the original lease it was held that as the lessee was in possession and willing to carry out his part of the contract but was never called upon to take renewal by the lessor his right to enforce the option of renewal was not lost by laches.[2d] The period, for which the lease is to be renewed, will be the same as the original period unless it is otherwise provided for in the lease.[3] As regards the other terms of the renewed lease,

It is a matter depending purely on the interpretation of each lease, whether it contains a provision for renewal. See the undermentioned decisions[6] for illustrative cases. There is no presumption that, unless a contrary intention is shown, the lessee will have an option of renewal.[7] On the other hand, the 'prima facie' presumption is that on the expiry of the term fixed by a lease, the lessee's right is intended to come to an end. But the provision for renewal may be in any form. An express covenant to renew in appropriate technical language is not essential.[8]

A clause for the perpetual renewal of a lease is valid.[9] Thus, for instance, if the original lease is for a period of eleven years, the lessee may be entitled to a renewal of the lease at the beginning of every successive period of eleven years.[10]

A perpetual lease and a lease with a clause for perpetual renewal are not the same.[11] In the former case a perpetual 'interest' in immovable property is created once and for all. But in the latter case, the lessee has merely an option of having the lease renewed in his favour at the end of every successive period. The right under such option of renewal is not an 'interest' in immovable property.

A covenant for perpetual renewal being a serious derogation from the rights of the landlord must be strictly proved. There must be unequivocal and unambiguous ground for holding that a lease contains such a convenant. Otherwise such a covenant cannot be held to exist.[12]

A covenant for renewal contained in a lease may be specifically enforced as any other contract for the transfer of immovable property, and the principles and considerations applicable in both cases would be the same. The undermentioned are illustrative cases.[13]

It has been held that a covenant for renewal does not operate as a present demise but is a mere contract which can be given effect to, by enforcing specific performance only, in case of refusal to perform it by the lessor; and as the contract of lease and the covenant for renewal are two separate contracts the ratification of the lease does not necessarily amount to a ratification of the covenant for renewal.[13a]

An agreement to renew a lease may be a term in the lease itself or it may form a separate contract subsequently entered into between the parties. In the former case, it would be a covenant running with the land enforceable both by the original lessee and the assignees of the lease. (See Note 36). But in the latter case it would be merely a 'personal' right of the lessee with whom the contract is made and would not be enforceable by the assignees of the lease.

'Stamp'.—In the case cited below,[14] it was held that a lease containing a clause for renewal was not an instrument comprising two distinct matters for the purpose of stamp duty.

36. Covenant for renewal — Enforceability against assignee from lessor or lessee. — A covenant for renewal contained in a lease is what is known as a covenant running with the land.[1] The burden and benefit of such a covenant passes with the estate of the covenator and the covenantee. (see Note 25 on S. 40.) Hence, such a covenant is binding on any person, in whom the property is vested for the time being. Such a covenant is, therefore, enforceable against the transferees of the property from the lessor. The question whether the transfer was for consideration or not, or whether the transferee had notice of the covenant or not, is immaterial in such cases.[2]

But a covenant for renewal contained in a lease granted by a person with a limited interest will not bind the persons who would take the estate by succession after the expiry of such an interest. Thus, a covenant for renewal contained in a lease granted by a Hindu widow will not bind the reversioners succeeding to the estate after her death.[3]

On the principle referred to above, a covenant for renewal contained in a lease can be enforced by any person in whom the leasehold estate is vested for the time being. Thus, the assignee of a lease can enforce such a covenant.[4]

The covenant can also be enforced against such an assignee.

Where a lessee holds over after the expiry of the original term with the assent of the lessor and the tenancy is renewed under S. 116 from month to month or year to year as the case may be, the lessee has a transferable interest in the property. If he is entitled to an option of renewal of the original lease such option also will pass to an assignee of his interest.[5] It must be noted that in such a case there is no 'distinct' and separate lease formed by the holding over under S. 116.[6] The effect of such holding over is to 'renew' the old lease on different terms as to the period of the lease.

Such a 'renewal' implies that the lease is the 'same'. The covenant for renewal, therefore, 'continues' to be an incident of the lessee's interest in such a case, even after the expiry of the original term. The assignee in such a case gets therefore the 'very' lease which contained the covenant for renewal. But if the tenancy formed after the expiry of the original term is not a 'renewal' of the original lease but a 'fresh' and distinct tenancy the covenant for renewal contained in the original lease would not be an incident of such a 'fresh' tenancy and the assignee of such a tenancy would not be entitled to enforce such a covenant.

A mortgagee is not an 'assignee' of the lease.[7] Because, the whole of the leasehold estate is not transferred to the mortgagee. It is only an interest in the leasehold estate that is transferred to the mortgagee. But this rule does not apply to an 'English' mortgage. In such a case, the property is transferred 'absolutely' to the mortgagee. The mortgagor has only a right to a re-transfer of the property on the discharge of the mortgage. (See S. 58.) Hence, an 'English' mortgagee would be an assignee of the lease[8] entitled to enforce a covenant for renewal.

But it has been held that 'specific performance' of a covenant for renewal ought not to be enforced even against an 'English' mortgagee of the interest of a lessee holding over after expiry of the original term.[9] The reason given is that specific performance is an 'equitable' remedy, and that there is no 'equity' in compelling a 'mortgagee' to perfect his title so as to become legally liable for rent to the lessor.

An 'independent' contract (not forming a covenant contained in a lease) for the renewal of a lease will not run with the land. Such a contract will only give rise to an obligation attached to the ownership of immovable property. Under S. 40, such an obligation will not be enforceable against transferees of the property for consideration 'without' notice of the contract.[10] Such a contract will bind only 'gratuitous' transferees and transferees for consideration 'with notice' of the contract.[11]

37. Lessee holding over after expiration of lease — General. — On the determination of a lease, the lessee's right of possession of the property comes to an end. He has not even a 'personal' right of possession not amounting to an interest in the property. Nor is his possession 'ipso facto permissive'. Hence in such cases, the lessee is not even in the position of a 'licensee'. His possession is, therefore, wrongful.[1] (As to whether and to what extent it can be adverse, see Note 80.) In legal parlance he is known as a tenant by sufferance.[2] Thus, the expression tenant by sufferance does

His position is different from that of a tenant at will. In the latter case, there is a 'subsisting' tenancy. It follows from the above that a tenant by sufferance can be sued in ejectment by the lessor without there being any notice to quit or even a demand of possession before the suit.[4] But as seen in Note 32 a suit for ejectment cannot be brought by the lessor against a 'tenant at will' without first determining the tenancy by notice to quit or demand of possession.

A tenant by sufferance cannot, however, be dispossessed by the landlord otherwise than in due course of law.[5] If he is so dispossessed, he can sue for possession against the lessor under S. 9 of the Specific Relief Act.[5a]

A lessee holding over after the expiry of his term without the lessor's assent has a right to the property which is good as against the whole world except the true owner. This is based on the general principle that possession itself constitutes a good title except against the true owner.[6]

If the landlord assents to the tenant continuing in possession after the expiry of a lease, the lease is renewed from year to year or month under S. 116 according to the purpose of the tenancy. The assent of the lanlord may be express or implied. (See Note 38.)

till the date of vacating the property, if the lessee should continue in possession after the expiration of the term, there would be no subsisting relationship of 'landlord and tenant' between the parties after such expiration.[7] Similarly, under English law a contract of tenancy would seem to imply a contract to pay rent till the date of giving up possession of the property, if the lessee should continue in possession after the expiration of the lease.[8] But even this does not necessarily import the continuation of the relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties after the term.[9]

But where by usage, although a lease may be executed nominally for certain period, a term is 'implied' that the lessee and his representatives should be entitled to continue in possession even after the expiry of such period, the lessee or his representative so continuing in possession will not be a tenant by sufferance. It is this principle which underlies the observations of Sadasiva Iyer, J., in the case noted below.[10] In that case he pointed out the inappropriateness of treating as a mere trespasser an agricultural tenant in the Madras Presidency holding over after the expiry of alleged term of his lease. (See also Note 29.)

The term tenant by sufferance has also been applied to the 'heirs' of a life-tenant who continue in possession after the death of such tenant.[11] In the undermentioned case [12] the right in question was held to be 'licence' and it was remarked that if it was a 'tenure' of any sort, it was a tenancy by sufferance. But as seen already, a licence imports a permission of the owner while a tenancy by sufferance does not import such a permission.

In 'Adimulam v. Pir Ravuthan'[13] the Madras High Court held that a tenancy by sufferance was a form of tenancy and that it required to be determined before the lessee could be sued in ejectment. This view is not correct and is not good law.

Topham in his 'New Law of Property,' 4th Edn., 1932, classes a tenancy by sufferance as a form of 'leasehold' interest. He calls it the smallest estate known to the law, though he says the landlord can turn such a tenant out of possession by an action of ejectment without giving him notice. Topham also points out that a tenancy by sufferance is not a 'legal' estate under the English law. Topham's classification may be understood in the following light. Although the possession of a tenant by sufferance is 'wrongful,' he has a good title except against the 'owner' of the property. In this sense, there does not seem to be anything wrong in referring to a tenant by sufferance as having an 'estate' in the land. But it is not clear how a tenancy by sufferance can be said to be a form of 'leasehold' interest, seeing that there is no privity between the parties in such a case. It is clear that the mere fact that the lessor 'suffers' the tenant to continue in possession is not sufficient to create a 'leasehold' interest in the legal sense of the term. But a similar objection may be taken also to the use of the words "tenant" and "tenancy" to describe the position of a tenant who holds over after the expiry of his lease without the assent of his landlord. It only seems to be a case of a loose use of terms adopted for the sake of convenience where such loose use is not likely to create any confusion.

It has been held that a tenancy by sufferance, assuming that it is an 'interest' in property, terminates on the death of the tenant[14] or on transfer by him.[15]

There is no substantial difference between a tenant by sufferance and a trespasser, as he is sometimes called.[36] But a tenant by sufferance enters by lawful demise or title though he afterwards wrongfully continues in possession. But a trespasser's entry on the property is itself wrongful.

38. Lessee holding over after expiration of lease — Lessor's assent.— Under S. 116, if a lessee continues to hold possession of the property after the determination of the lease and the lessor by acceptance of rent from him, or otherwise, assents to his doing so, the lease is renewed from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the tenancy. But apart from the provisions of S. 116 the payment and acceptance of rent may give rise by implication to a fresh tenancy between the parties after the expiry of the original one. Such a tenancy also would, in the absence of a contract, local law or usage to the contrary, be deemed under S. 106 to be one from year to year or month to month.[1] But there is one important difference between a tenancy renewed under S. 116 (or under the principle thereof, where such principle is applicable) and a fresh tenancy created between the parties. In the former case, the tenancy continues to be the same.[2] But in the latter case the tenancy is not the same as the original one but a distinct and separate one. In the undermentioned case[2a] the lease deed provided for the lessee building a house for the purpose of a shop on the land and carrying on business and paying rent every year to the lessor. There was a further provision that if rent was not paid in any year the lessor would be entitled to recover khas possession of the land. The lessee failed to pay rent and the lessor instead of recovering possession under the provisions of the lease deed, obtained a rent decree and in execution brought the property to sale. The property was purchased in auction by a third person. In a suit brought by the lessor against the third person for ejectment on the ground that the tenancy was a tenancy at will and was determined by a proper notice to qult, ¡it was held that the lease was a lease for life of the lessee subject to its determination if he failed to pay rent in any year; that when the original lessee failed to pay rent the lessor could have recovered possession; but as he did not do so and caused the property to be sold, the effect of the auction sale coupled with receipt of rent from the auction-purchaser was to create in him a tenancy in the terms of the original lease, that is to say, during the life of the original lessee determinable on the grounds mentioned in the lease.

Whether, the tenancy by sufferance by the tenant continuing in possession after the expiry of a tenancy is converted into a tenancy in the legal sense of the term by renewal or otherwise, depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.[3] But slight evidence would be sufficient for this purpose.[4]

Where after the expiry of a tenancy, a fresh lease-deed is executed but it is inadmissible in evidence owing to want of registration, the tenant can fall back upon the tenancy formed or renewed by payment and acceptance of rent and would not be without title.[5]

39. Lessee holding over after expiration of lease — Renewal clause in lease, effect of. — As seen in Note 35, a covenant for renewal contained in a lease does not, by itself, extend the term of the lease, but only entitles the lessee to obtain a fresh lease. Hence, if the lessee continues in possession after the expiration of the original lease, he will not be entitled to any 'interest' in the property merely by virtue of the covenant for renewal. If the lessor assents to such holding over by the lessee, the lease will be renewed from year to year or month to month under S. 116 or a 'fresh' tenancy of a similar kind may be created by implication from payment and acceptance of rent. (See Note 38.)

Apart from this, if the lessor sues for the ejectment of the lessee before the expiration of the period for which renewal has been promised, the lessee may be entitled to resist such a suit on various equitable grounds, such as the principle of part performance, the doctrine of 'Walsh v. Lonsdale,'[1] etc. In such cases, the position of the lessee will be no higher than that of a person who is in possession of immovable property under a contract for the transfer of such property. As seen in Note 4 such a contract does not 'ipso facto' constitute a good defence to a suit for ejectment against the intended transferee. For an account of the development of the law regarding the equitable grounds mentioned above, reference may be made to S. 53A and the Notes thereon.

Under the principles discussed in those Notes, the lessee in such cases will not be entitled to rely on the 'English' doctrine of part performance, such doctrine having been held inapplicable to India. He will, however, be entitled to rely on the principle of that doctrine 'as embodied' in S. 53A, if the conditions required by that section are present. In cases in which specific performance of the covenant can be enforced, the lessee can obtain a stay of the suit for ejectment and sue for specific performance, on the principle laid down in 'Ariff v. Jadunath.[2] But it must be noted that the doctrine of 'Walsh v. Lonsdale[3] under which the lessee would be entitled to an equitable 'estate' in the property, if the contract for the grant of a lease is specifically enforceable, does not apply to India. (See Note 3 on section 53A.)

Where, for any reason the lessee is not entitled to rely on the above-mentioned grounds of defence, but the tenancy has been renewed from year to year or month to month under S. 116 (or a fresh tenancy of a similar nature has been formed) the lessee can rely on his rights under such tenancy.[4]

As regards the case-law on the subject, some decisions simply hold that a covenant for renewal would be a good defence to a suit for ejectment by the lessor in such cases.[5] With regard to such decisions the caution is necessary that a covenant for renewal will not be a good defence, if specific performance is not enforceable at the date of the suit.

In 'Jardine Skinner and Co. v. Rani Surut Soondari Debi[6] the Privy Council expressed the view that if the lessor sought to turn out the lessee before the expiry of the period for which renewal has been promised, the lessee can 'compel' him to renew the lease according to the covenant. This clearly implies that the covenant for renewal must be capable of being specifically enforceable at the time of the suit, if it should be available as a defence to the suit for ejectment by the lessor. Their Lordships have clearly pointed out that the lessee does not get any 'interest' in the property merely by virtue of the clause for renewal. This is also the view which accords with the latest decisions of the Privy Council. (See Note 3 on S. 53A.) See also the undermentioned cases[7] which proceed on the same basis.

Some decisions speak of the lessee in such cases as having an 'estate' in the property.[8] Others hold that the lessee is in the same position 'as if the promised renewal has been made."[9] Such decisions obviously proceed on the applicability of the doctrine of 'Walsh v. Lonsdale[10] to India—a view which is not correct. (See Section 53A, Note 3.)

Where a lessee has been allowed to be in possession of the property for the full term for which renewal had been promised, he cannot thereafter rely on the covenant for renewal in defence to the suit for ejectment by the lessor,[11] because in such a case, there would be no equity in his favour and the covenant for renewal would not be specifically enforceable.

Where a lessee holds over after the expiry of his term and the landlord assents to his doing so, the effect is not to renew the lease for the 'full period' provided for under the covenant for renewal but only from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the tenancy.[12] Where a lease is thus 'renewed' from year to year or month to month, the lease so renewed is only a continuation of the original lease and not a distinct lease.[13] Hence, the covenant for renewal which forms part of the original lease constitutes also a part of the renewed lease, and an assignee of such lease can enforce the covenant. (See Note 36.)

40. Lessee holding over after expiry of lease — Basis of liability for compensation. — As seen in Note 37 where a lessee holds over after a lease has expired, and the landlord has not assented to such holding over, the lessee's possession is 'wrongful.' Hence, he is liable for mesne profits from the date of the determination of the lease.[1] He will not be liable for 'rent' as there is no subsisting relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. Nor will he be liable for damages for 'use and occupation'[2] as his continuing in possession is not with the 'permission' of the landlord. (See Note 70.) His liability for compensation is 'ex delicto' i. e., based on his liability for a 'tort' whereas a claim for use and occupation is one arising 'ex contractu,' i. e., based on a contract (implied by law).[3]

41. Permanent lease. — This section expressly provides that a lease may be granted in perpetuity.[1] Under English law, a permanent lease is not valid.[2] The question whether a lease is a permanent one or not is one of construction depending on the facts and circumstances of each case. Merely because a lease is silent as to its term, it cannot be held to be a permanent lease. In such a case, it will be deemed to be a lease from year to year or month to month under S. 106.[3] Similarly, where the lease is intended to go on 'indefinitely' and no definite term is fixed for the lease, it will be deemed to be a lease for the life of the lessee, and not a permanent lease. (See Note 28.)

This section refers to the creation of a permanent lease by 'act of parties.' But a permanent tenancy can also arise by local usage or Act of the Legislature.[4] Such a tenancy, however, will not be directly governed by the provisions of this Act.

A permanent tenancy can also be acquired by prescription. See Notes 79 to 81.) A landlord may also be 'estopped' from denying the permanent character of a tenancy. (See Note 55.) A permanent lease is liable to forfeiture as any other lease.[5] (See also Note 47.)

Even a permanent lease is only a transfer of the right of 'possession'. The right of 'ownership' or any interest therein is not transferred in such a case.[1] This distinguishes a permanent lease from a sale.[2] This also distinguishes it from various kinds of tenures in India of a permanent and hereditary character. Such tenures, no doubt, do not constitute the 'full' ownership of property. They are interests of a subordinate character. But the interest is one in the 'ownership' of the property and not merely the right of possession. Hence, the transfers in such cases are of an 'absolute' character. The transfer is not merely that of a right which comes back to the transferor, the moment it ceases to belong to a different person. On the right ceasing to belong to any one by the death of the last possessor intestate and without leaving any heirs, it will pass by escheat to the Crown. (See Note 6.)

In 'Sonet Kooer v. Himmut Bahadur'[3] a mokarrari hereditary tenure granted for the purpose of maintenance by a zamindar in Bengal was held by the Privy Council to be an 'absolute' interest in the land of the above kind. A grant of what is referred to in the decisions as "underproprietary rights" will also come under this category. When it is made for a price such a grant has been treated as a sale.[4] On the same principle an inam is different from a permanent lease.[5] So in 'Tarachand Biswas v. Ram Govind Chowdhry'[6] it was held by the Calcutta High Court that putnis, darputnis, seputnis, etc., in India are not mere leases but substantial interests in land. But at the same time it was held that such transactions were not out and out sales in spite of the payment of consideration. It was held that the transferee under such a transaction was entitled to possession. In 'Arumugham v. Subramaniam'[7] Varadachariar, J., pointed out in his Judgment of Reference to the Full Bench that under Indian law, an 'under-tenure' is not the same as 'tenancy.'

Whether a transaction is a permanent lease or a sale or the creation of a subordinate proprietary right is a question depending on the facts and circumstances of each case. The payment of something corresponding to rent is not a conclusive test. Such payment is quite consistent even with a sale. In the undermentioned cases[8] the transaction was held to be a 'lease' and not a sale or any other kind of transfer of a proprietary interest. In the cases noted below,[9] the transaction was held to be a sale or other kind of transfer of a proprietary right, notwithstanding the reservation of a payment corresponding to rent.

Where the transaction is a permanent lease, on the death of the last holder of the lease intestate and without leaving any heirs, the interest will revert to the grantor on the principle discussed in Note 6.[10] But if the interest is an 'absolute' one it will pass by escheat to Crown.[11] The undermentioned decisions [11a] must be understood in the light of the above principles.

A lease in perpetuity is not recognised as a lease under the English law. It is treated as a transfer of the fee simple. But this section expressly provides that a lease may be one in perpetuity.

(In this case the transaction is referred to as a permanent lease and yet it is held to create an absolute estate which escheats to the Crown on the death of the last holder intestate and without leaving any heirs.)]

The decision of the Privy Council in 'Sonet Kooer's case,[11b] referred to above, must not be taken to lay down that on the death of the last holder of a permanent 'lease,' intestate and without leaving any heirs, his interest will pass by escheat to the Crown and not revert to the grantor of the estate. The interest in question in that case is expressly held to be an 'absolute' one. In 'Panchubala v. Jotindra'[12] the interest is referred to as a permanent 'lease' and yet is held to be an 'absolute' interest which escheats to the Crown on the death of the last holder intestate and without leaving any heirs. Reliance is placed for this purpose on the decision in 'Sonet Kooer's case'. It looks as if their Lordships have not correctly appreciated the decision in 'Sonet Kooer's case'.

43. Permanent tenancy — Onus of proof. — Where the relationship of landlord and tenant is established between two persons and the tenant claims that the tenancy is a permanent one, it is for him to prove his claim. It is not for the landlord to prove that the tenancy is not permanent. Unless the contrary is proved, the law will presume the tenancy not to be permanent. This principle is recognised in S. 106 which provides that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, a lease will be deemed to be one from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the lease. It is true that a tenancy may be permanent by custom or under a statutory provision, irrespective of the agreement between the parties. But in every case it is for the tenant to establish that by agreement, custom or law his tenancy is permanent.[1] So, in 'Nainapillai v. Ramanathan'[2] the Privy Council observed as follows:

"It cannot now be doubted that when a tenant of lands in India in a suit by his landlord to eject him from them, sets up a defence that he has a right of permanent tenancy in the lands, the onus of proving that he has such right is upon the tenant.... A permanent right of occupancy in land in India is a right, subject to certain conditions, of a tenant, to hold the land permanently which he occupies. It is a heritable right, and in some places it possibly may be transferable by the tenant to a stranger. That permanent right of occupancy can only be obtained by a tenant by custom, or by a grant from an owner of the land who happens to have power to grant such a right, or under an Act of the Legislature."

In 'Seturatnam Aiyar v. Venkatachela Goundan[3] the Privy Council said as follows:

"Permanence is not a universal and integrent incident of an under-ryot's holding; if claimed, it must be established. This may be done by proving a custom, a contract, or a title and possibly by other means."[4]

Where, however, the entire evidence on both sides is once before the Court, the question as to onus of proof is not material and is purely of academic interest and the issue as to permanence will be determined on the evidence before the Court and not with reference to the question of burden of proof.[5]

Where a tenant sets up a permanent tenancy but fails to establish his claim, he can fall back upon any lesser title which may be proved.[6]

44. Principle of lost grant as applied to permanent tenancies. — Under S. 107 a permanent lease can only be created by a registered deed. But neither writing nor registration was necessary for the granting of such a lease before this Act was passed.[1] Under S. 2, rights created under leases granted before the Act are not affected by the provisions of this Act.

If such lease has been granted by a written instrument, then under S. 91 of the Evidence Act, the terms of the lease can only be proved by producing such document or by secondary evidence thereof. In such cases, the question whether a permanent lease has been granted will be a question of construction of the document. But in case of ambiguity in the document evidence of the conduct of the parties and other circumstances would be admissible to prove the nature of the interest created.[2] Such evidence would also be admissible for a similar purpose, if no direct evidence is forthcoming of a 'verbal' lease. Where the origin of the tenancy is not known, then the history and mode of enjoyment of the property and other circumstances connected with it constitute the only evidence, from which to infer the nature of the tenancy.[3] But there is an important distinction between the last mentioned case and the two cases previously mentioned.

This distinction consists in the presumption of an origin in a lawful title which would be applicable to a case where the origin of the tenancy is 'not known'. This presumption does not apply where the origin of the tenancy is 'known'. In such cases, circumstantial evidence, where admissible, must establish 'conclusively' that the tenancy is a permanent one.[4] No doubt, under S. 114 of the Evidence Act, the Court 'may' presume the grant of a permanent tenancy, if the proved facts make such grant 'likely' in the opinion of the Court. But the Court is not 'bound' to presume such grant. But where the origin of the tenancy is 'not known', the presumption of a lawful origin is one of 'law' which the Court is 'bound' to make if the evidence justifies such a presumption. Further, much less evidence would be sufficient to justify such presumption than would be necessary to make a grant of permanent tenancy 'likely'. To raise such presumption of origin in a lawful title, it is sufficient if the evidence is such that a grant of permanent tenancy is in its nature practicable and 'reasonably capable of being presumed' without doing violence to the probabilities of the case.[5] This presumption of lawful origin is also referred to as the presumption of a "lost grant," it being presumed that there was a grant, the evidence of which has been lost.

But apart from the presumption of lawful origin above referred to, even considering the matter as one of likelihood under S. 114 of the Evidence Act, the fact that the origin of a tenancy is not known will make it easier to draw an inference of permanence in favour of the tenant than if the origin of the tenancy is known.[6]

When can the origin of a tenancy be said to be not known? It has been held by the Calcutta High Court that where it is known who the original parties to a lease were, the mere fact that the date of the letting is not known will not make the tenancy one of unknown origin.[7] In a Bombay case,[8] the date of a tenancy was known but the records containing evidence as to the

There is no reference to S. 114 of the Evidence Act under which if the evidence makes the grant of a permanent tenancy likely the Court may presume such grant till the contrary is proved. But it should be taken that his Lordship includes an inference drawn by means of a presumption under S. 114 of the Evidence Act within his proposition. terms of the lease were destroyed during riots. It was held that the tenancy was not of unknown origin. Decisions bearing on S. 83 para. (2) of the Bombay Land Revenue Code may usefully be referred to in this connection.[9]

In the case-law on this subject there is generally no reference to the presumption of lawful origin or lost grant. But there is no room for thinking that such a presumption is considered not applicable to such cases. In 'Nainapillai v. Ramanathan'[10] the Privy Council remarked that "as no grant of a right of permanent occupancy has been produced or even alleged, it is not apparent how a right of permanent occupancy could have been obtained by the defendants or by any predecessor in title of theirs, except by a lost grant or grants, and that is not even suggested." This clearly implies that in their Lordships' opinion the presumption of "lost grant" may apply to such cases. And in 'Abdul Hakim v. Elahi Baksha[11] Chakravarti, J., expressly stated that the principle on which a permanent tenancy is proved by circumstantial evidence in cases of tenancies of unknown origin is the principle of lost grant. Rankin, J., in 'Kamal Kumar v. Nandalal', [12] however, considered that the reference to a "lost grant" in such cases is "confusing and misleading." It would appear that in his Lordship's view such a theory is useful only where there is a question of the 'law fulness' of a permanent grant. As permanent tenancies before the Transfer of Property Act could be created without writing or registration, there could be no question of any legal defect on account of their mode of creation and where there is no question of any other legal defect the theory of lost grant need not be invoked. But his Lordship has overlooked the observations (above referred to) in 'Nainapillai v. Ramanathan' which show that the presumption of lost grant may be usefully resorted to in such cases, even though the 'legality' of the grant may not be in question.

9. See for instance—(1900) 2 Bom L R 93 (94) (DB), Raghunath v. Lakshuman. (The saving clause of S. 83, seems to contemplate that though the commencement and duration of the tenancy may be lost in the obscurity of antiquity, still there may be vested in the landlord a right by agreement to enhance rent and evict for its non-payment.)

10. ('24) 11 AIR 1924 P C 65 (72): 47 Mad 337: 51 Ind App 83: 82 Ind Cas 226 (PC). NOTE.—As their Lordships have stated that the only possible way in which a permanent tenancy could be proved in the case was by a lost grant, their discussion of the probabilities of the case must be taken to relate to the question whether a lost grant can be presumed in the case. They hold that in the circumstances of the case, a lost grant cannot be presumed. This is what they mean by saying that such grant is "not even suggested," and not that the plea has not been taken and therefore they are not going to consider the question. In AIR 1930 P C 103: 57 Cal 1293: 57 Ind App 125 (P C) their Lordships presumed the legality of a permanent grant but in this case they refused to do so. This is because in AIR 1930 PC 103: 57 Cal 1293: 57 Ind App 125 (PC) there was sufficient material before the Court to presume the legality, while in this case there was no sufficient material for the purpose.)

11. ('25) 12 AIR 1925 Cal 309 (312): 52 Cal 43: 85 Ind Cas 103 (DB).

12. ('29) —16 AIR 1929 Cal 37 (40): 56 Cal 738: 116 Ind Cas 378 (DB). (NOTE.—Both the learned Judges in this case (Rankin and Mukerji, JJ.) treat the question as one purely of inference of fact, though the tenancy was of an unknown origin. Mukerji, J., pointedly says that the circumstantial evidence in support of the claim of permanent tenancy must be so strong that it can possibly lead to no other inference. This brings out clearly what difference it would make if the presumption of lost grant is resorted to. For raising such presumption, the above high degree of proof is not necessary. It is not even necessary that the grant of permanent tenancy must be likely on the evidence in the case. It is sufficient if such grant is reasonably capable of being presumed from the evidence, which is a very different thing from the grant being likely.)

As already pointed out, this presumption is distinct from an 'inference' of permanent tenancy and may establish such tenancy, even though as a mere matter of inference from evidence such tenancy may not be held as proved. In 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v. Bibi Jabeda Khatun',[13] the Privy Council expressly applied the presumption of a lawful origin to a case of permanent tenancy. No doubt, in that case, their Lordships were concerned with the 'legality' of the grant. But their Lordships' observations are quite general and do not imply that they are confined to cases where the 'legality' of a grant is questioned. The principle of lost grant was referred to and applied in as old a decision as 'Gooroo Pershad v. Bykunto Chunder Roy,'[14] and though this does not seem to have been a case of 'permanent tenancy,' it shows that the principle is of general application.

The following passage from 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v. Bibi Jabeda Khatun'[15] shows the nature of a presumption of lawful origin and how it differs from an 'inference' of such origin under S. 114 of the Evidence Act :

> "The presumption of an origin in some lawful title, which the Courts have so often readily made in order to support possessory rights, long and quietly enjoyed, where no actual proof of title is forthcoming, is one which is not a mere branch of the law of evidence. It is resorted to because of the failure of actual evidence. Hence their Lordships cannot accept the appellant's contention that the provisions of the Evidence Act, S. 114, prevent the inference of a consent by the Kazi in the absence of any evidence of an application to the Kazi for leave, or some other proved fact of that kind. The matter is one of a presumption, based on the policy of the law but even considered as an inference from proved facts, the leave presumed is a thing, which may well be regarded as likely to have happened. At the same time it is not a presumption to be capriciously made, nor is it one which a certain class of possessor is entitled to 'de jure.' In a case such as this, where it is necessary to indicate what particular kind of lawful title is being presumed, the Court must be satisfied that such a title was in its nature practicable and reasonably capable of being presumed, without doing violence to the probabilities of the case. The presumption is not an "open sesame," with which to unlock in favour of particular kind of claimant a closed door, to which neither the law nor the proved facts would in themselves have afforded any key. It is the completion of a right, to which circumstances clearly point, where time has obliterated any record of the original commencement."

Note.—The reference to the permission of the kazi in the above passage is to be understood in this way. If the kazi had permitted the transaction it would be valid.

45. Permanent tenancy—Presumption of validity of grant in case of tenancies of unknown origin.—It has been seen in Note 44 that in the case of tenancies of unknown origin it may be presumed from the circumstances of the case that a permanent interest was granted, although as a matter purely of inference from evidence such a result may not necessarily follow. This presumption is one based on the 'policy of the law' and is not a part of the law of 'evidence.' The presumption will apply not only to the 'factum' of a grant but also as to its 'legality.' In 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v.

Bibi Jabeda Khatun,'[1] the presumption was applied to the legality of the grant of a permanent lease by the mutwalli of a wakf. It was held that the permission of the kazi which would have validated the lease must be presumed, in the circumstances of the case, although they might not be sufficient to make such permission 'likely' within the meaning of S. 114 of the Evidence Act. The decision followed 'Bawa Magniram v. Kasturbhai,'[2] where a similar presumption was made in respect of legal necessity for a permanent lease granted by the shebait of a mutt. But in 'Nainapillai v. Ramanathan'[2a] the Privy Council refused to presume the grant of a permanent lease in the circumstances of the case and one of the grounds given for its decision was that the lands in question were the property of a temple which could not be alienated except for legal necessity. In this case their Lordships approved of the decision of the Calcutta High Court in 'Satya Sri v. Kartik Chandra'[3] in which it was held that though normally the circumstances of the case would have been sufficient to justify a presumption that a permanent lease was granted, no such presumption could be made if the property was a debutter property. But these and similar decisions[4] have to be considered with reference to the clear enunciation of the law by the Privy Council in 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v. Bibi Jabeda Khatun' and cannot be regarded as affecting the proposition that the 'legality' as well as the 'factum' of a permanent lease can be presumed, if on the evidence before the Court such legality is reasonably capable of being presumed. The above decision also shows that this rule applies to transfers of property belonging to religious and charitable endowments. The decision in 'Nainapillai v. Ramanathan' must be taken to mean only that in that case the materials before the Court were not sufficient to draw the presumption of legality. From their Lordships' judgment it appears that such materials were not even sufficient to raise a presumption of the 'factum' of the grant. As regards the decision of the Calcutta High Court in 'Satya Sri v. Kartik Chandra' it is not clear if it was a case where the origin of the tenancy was 'unknown.' If the origin was 'known', then the presumption mentioned in 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v. Bibi Jabeda Khatun' would not apply. In such a case the question would purely be one of presumption of 'fact' under S. 114 of the Evidence Act and it may be considered that their Lordships have held that it cannot be presumed under that section that what is 'prima facie' an illegal act has been committed. The presumption referred to in 'Muhammad Mazaffaralmusavi v. Bibi Jabeda Khatun' based, as it is said to be, on the policy of the law, is, it is clear from that decision, not subject to any such considerations.

46. Permanent tenancy—Presumption of lawful origin.—See Notes 44 and 45.

47. Permanent tenancy—Construction of leases.—Where there is an instrument creating the tenancy, the question whether it is a permanent tenancy is one of construction of the instrument. The main rules as to construction of deeds have been discussed in S. 8, Note 20 and these rules will apply to such cases also. Under such rules, where the document is ambiguous or of doubtful import, the Court is entitled to take into consideration the surrounding circumstances and the mode of enjoyment of the property and the actings of the parties in coming to a conclusion if a permanent interest has been granted. In such cases, the Court can hold that a permanent tenancy has been granted, notwithstanding that the instrument itself is not clear on the point.[1] As to the nature of evidence that will be useful in this connexion, see Notes 48 to 51. But where the meaning of the document is clear, this course is not open to the Court and it must confine itself to the words used in the instrument.[2]

In considering the question whether an instrument confers a permanent lease, the use of formal words conveying the idea of permanency and the title of the document will have some importance. But this is not a factor which will be conclusive. The task of the Court is to consider the document as a whole and not to attach undue importance to the use of formal expressions by the parties. Hence, a document may be held to confer a permanent lease, notwithstanding the absence of any specific formal expressions denoting permanence. Similarly, notwithstanding the use of such expressions, the Court may hold that a permanent lease has not been granted. Thus, words providing that the lessee is to enjoy the property from generation to generation and words to similar effect 'prima facie' indicate a permanent right,[3] and their absence is a factor 'against' permanence.[4] But their presence[5] or absence[6] is not conclusive either way.

The following considerations may be noted in interpreting such documents:

The fact that a lease has been granted for the purpose of reclamation does not necessarily prove the lease to be permanent?

Where a lease has been granted for the purpose of erecting buildings, the fact may indicate that the lease is a permanent one.[8]

Where the terms of a lease and other circumstances indicate on the whole the grant of a permanent lease, the mere fact that the lease contains a provision for forfeiture in case of non-payment of rent or for other reason does not make the lease not permanent.[9]

Though a clause restraining transfer is 'prima facie' inconsistent with the grant of a permanent right, it is not conclusive.[10]

Though the fixing of rent without any liability for enhancement may suggest permanence, such liability for enhancement does not necessarily import that the lease is not permanent.[11]

A substantial premium suggests permanence.[12]

A clause which throws the entire cost of improvements on the lessee may indicate some degree of continuity but not necessarily perpetuity.[13]

The significance of various vernacular expressions which are commonly used in lease deeds in this country with reference to the question whether a permanent tenure is created is discussed below :

The word 'bemiad' simply means "without any term." It does not in itself import a permanent lease. But along with other circumstances it may indicate such lease.[15]

The words 'putra poutradi krame' support the theory of permanence.[16]

The term 'mirasi' denotes heritability and permanence of tenure.[17]

The term 'mourasi' implies a permanent hereditary tenure.[18]

NOTE.—In some early decisions of the Calcutta High Court, for instance, 12 Suth W R 3 and 5 Suth W R 101, it was held that the words "istimrari mokarari" by themselves imply a perpetual and heritable tenure, unless their effect is curtailed by other factors—1 Cal 391: 3 Ind App 92 (PC) also may seem capable of being interpreted as supporting this view —But in that case the words "generation to generation" also were used and the Privy Council gave this as the reason for their decision that the tenure was an absolute, hereditary mokarari one—The later decisions of the Privy Council, as well as of the High Courts, leave no doubt in the matter.

presumed.[1] Hence, whether such presumption is resorted to or not, the question of permanent tenancy, where an 'express' grant is not established, is one depending on the facts and circumstances of each case.[2]

The following are the elements which are usually taken into consideration in determining the permanent nature of a tenancy[3]: 1. The unknown origin of the tenancy. 2. Long and undisturbed possession by the tenant and his predecessors in title. 3. The payment of the same rent for a long period. 4. The tenancy being for residential or building purposes. 5. The erection of pucca buildings, etc., by the tenant on the land without any objection by the landlord. 6. The tenancy having been held by the same family, generation after generation. 7. Transfers of the tenancy and their recognition by the landlord.

But the above is not an exhaustive enumeration. None of these factors are by themselves conclusive. But the co-existence of a number of them will be of more or less probative force according to the circumstances of a case in establishing a permanent tenancy. In determining the question, therefore, the facts and circumstances of a case must be considered as a 'whole.' It is their 'cumulative' effect that must be considered.[4]

For the sake of greater convenience, however, the decisions bearing on the subject have been summarised in the following Notes 49 to 51 under headings which have reference to some of the main factors involved in such cases. See also the undermentioned cases.[5]

SECTION 105—NOTE 48

1. NOTE—In AIR 1924 P C 65 (72, 73, 74): 47 Mad 337: 51 Ind App 83 (PC) having expressly held that a permanent tenancy in the case could only be proved, if at all, by a lost grant, their Lordships consider the circumstances of the case and hold that a permanent tenancy is not established—This can only be understood as a decision that the materials before the Court were not such as to justify the presumption of lost grant—But in AIR 1930 P C 103 (105, 106): 57 Cal 1293: 57 Ind App 125 (PC) their Lordships considered the materials before the Court as sufficient to justify such a presumption.

known origin of the tenancy would be sufficient to prove the tenancy to be permanent.[3]

In 'Secretary of State for India v. Luchmeswar Singh,'[4] the Privy Council observed as follows:

> "The Government undoubtedly are tenants of the Darbhanga Raj. It is for them to show why the landlord may not recover his property, and they can only do that by proving that there is some agreement between them and their landlord, that they shall have something more than the ordinary tenancy at will or from year to year. All they offer is some conjecture of such an agreement founded simply on their long possession at a uniform rate of payment. If we could not find out the origin of these things, there would be strength in that argument, but as the origin of them is known, the argument loses its force."

But in view of the general position of the case-law on this point, it does not seem as if the Privy Council intended in the last sentence of the above passage, to lay down that where the origin of a tenancy is unknown, long and undisturbed possession at an unvarying rent would be sufficient in every case to raise a presumption of permanence.

It must also be noted here that the presumption of lawful origin in cases of tenancies of unknown origin, referred to in Note 44 does 'not' involve as a rule of law the proprosition that, whenever in such cases the tenant is known to have been in possession for a long time at a fixed rent, it ought to be presumed that a permanent tenancy has been granted. As pointed out in that Note, such a presumption does not arise automatically and 'de jure' in favour of a particular kind of possessor. It is a presumption that arises only when there is positive evidence to sustain it. There must be evidence from which a grant of permanent tenancy must at least be reasonably capable of being presumed, though the evidence need not be sufficient to make such grant 'likely.'

Length of possession at a fixed rent when it co-exists with other factors may give rise to an inference of permanence of tenancy, especially if the origin of the tenancy is not known.[5] For instance, if the value of the property in the locality has gone up very high and the rent fixed is comparatively low, the fact that it has not been raised 'may' suggest that the tenancy is a permanent one.[6] See also cases under Notes 50 and 51.

The fact that the rent paid has not been uniform or that the possession of the tenant has been interrupted, is a factor which will weaken a claim of permanent tenancy.[7] origin of the tenancy is not known and the tenant and his predecessors-in-title have been in undisturbed possession of the property for a long time at a uniform rent.[2] The existence of 'pucca' structures will add to the strength of the inference. But the absence of such structures and the fact that there are only 'katcha' structures on the land will not necessarily defeat an inference of permanence suggested by other circumstances in the case.[3] But the mere fact that the tenancy has been created for dwelling purposes will not by itself give rise to an inference of permanence. As seen in Note 48, it is the 'combination' of several factors that generally gives rise to an inference of a permanent right. 51. Circumstantial evidence as to permanent tenancy — Successions and transfers.—The fact that a tenancy has been held in the same family from generation to generation would be some indication that tenancy is permanent.[1] But this is not a strong indication. Because as pointed out by Rankin, J., in 'Kamal Kumar v. Nandlal Dubey,[2] no reasonable landlord would eject a family from a homestead merely because the father or grandfather has died. But at the same time, the fact that a tenancy is not shown to be hereditary would weaken the case for permanency.[3]

The fact that there have been transfers of the holding which have been recognised by the landlord is strong indication of the tenancy being permanent.[4] Where the other circumstances show that the landlord has recognised

a transfer, the mere fact that in the rent receipts, the name of the old tenant is retained does not defeat such inference.[5]

Where, however, the transfers are recent and not such as to have come to the notice of the landlord they will not be evidence against him suggesting a permanent tenancy.[6]

52. Subsequent arrangements between landlord and tenant—Effect on inference of permanence.—On the principles discussed in Note 48, in the case of old tenancies which have gone on for a long time it may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances that a permanent lease was granted. But this rule will not hold good if there has been a subsequent arrangement between the parties, into which their original rights have merged. In such a case, their relations must be determined with reference to such arrangement.[1] But if the arrangement is only of a confirmatory character, the original rights will not be affected. So also, though annual 'kabuliyats' are sometimes executed there may be no 'intention' to act on them. In such cases, the original rights of the parties will not be affected.[2] Similarly, where the rent is not fixed and parties enter into periodic agreements as regards the rent payable, such agreements cannot affect the question of the 'duration' of the lease.[3] It is a question of fact and construction in each case as to what is the effect of the arrangement in question. In the cases cited below,[4] it was held that a new tenancy had been created, while in the undermentioned cases[5] it was held that no new tenancy was created and that the original rights of the parties remained unaffected.

53. Acquisition of permanent tenancy after commencement of tenancy. —Possession for any length of time will not by itself be sufficient to convert a tenancy (which is not permanent) into a permanent one[1] in the absence of statutory provision or custom under which such permanent right is acquired. In the absence of such statutory provision or custom, the tenant setting up a permanent right must show that by a subsequent arrangement with the landlord his original tenancy has been converted into a permanent one.[2] As to acquisition of permanent rights by adverse possession, see Notes 79 and 80. 56. Permanent lease of property belonging to religious and charitable endowments.—As seen in Note 7 on S. 7, managers of religious and charitable endowments in India have very limited powers of alienating endowed property and they cannot transfer such property except for unavoidable necessity. As to whether in the case of permanent leases granted long ago, where the circumstances under which they were granted are impossible to prove, the Courts will presume the existence of the conditions justifying the grant of such leases, see Note 45.

57. Consideration for lease.—One of the essentials of a lease under this section is the presence of 'consideration' for the transaction. This consideration must be either premium or rent as defined by the section. In other words if the consideration for the transfer is not either premium or rent as defined by the section, the transaction will not be a lease.[1] The section speaks of the consideration being premium 'or' rent. But it is conceived it will cover cases, where the consideration is partly premium and partly rent.[2]

A sum of money payable under a lease but not as a consideration for the 'grant of the lease' is not rent or premium within the meaning of this section (see Note 59). Thus, where a lease is granted in consideration of the lessee buying certain goods or accepting certain services from the lessor and paying for them at a certain rate, the 'lease' is not granted in consideration of the money to be so paid and such money is not rent.[3]

Where under a building agreement a builder agrees with the owner of land to erect houses thereon and to expend in so doing not less than a specified amount, in consideration of a lease thereof being granted to him on completion of the houses, the sum so expended on their erection is not a payment made in consideration of the lease.[4] It is in the nature of a 'collateral' agreement. (See Note 59.)

As to whether a grant for maintenance is to be treated as a grant for consideration of the kind defined in this section, see Notes 60 and 68.

It has been held that under the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, a tenancy can be created without consideration.[5]

58. Premium.—The section defines premium as the price paid or promised for the lease. A similar expression occurs in S. 54 also and the principles discussed in Note 12 on that section will apply here also.- As seen in that Note "price" means money only.[1] But it will include not only actual cash but also money 'due.'[2] But it must be price paid or promised for the 'lease,' i. e., for the transfer of the right to 'enjoy' the property. If it is a price for the 'property' itself which is to vest in the lessee at the end of the period of the lease, though the agreement for such payment and purchase of the property may be 'consideration' for the granting of the lease, it will not be 'premium.'[3] (See Note 57.)

The amount due must be ascertained or capable of ascertainment at the time of the transfer. A grant in lieu of maintenance, where no definite sum of money is due as maintenance will not, therefore, be a lease.[4] (See Note 68.)

The distinction between rent and premium is that the latter is a 'lump sum,' though it may not be paid in cash at once but only 'promised' or may be payable in instalments,[5] while rent, if it is to be paid in money, is a 'periodical' payment.[6] The other points of distinction are that rent may be in money or in kind or in the form of services, while premium can only be in the form of money. Where, looking at the substance of the transaction, the payment is premium and not rent, it will not cease to be such merely because it is styled as "advance rent."[7]

Unlike a 'vendor' of immovable property who has a statutory lien for unpaid purchase-money, a lessor has no lien for unpaid premium.[8]

The consideration for a lease paid in the form of a premium is exhausted as soon as the lease is granted and the forfeiture of the lease does not entitle the lessee to a refund of the premium.[9] Similarly, where a part of the premium is paid and it is agreed that if the balance is not paid within a fixed time, the lessor is to be entitled to cancel the lease and recover possession and on the default of the lessee the lessor proceeds to do so, the lessee is not entitled to a refund of the part of the premium paid by him.[10]

59. Rent—General features.—As seen in Note 57, rent is one of the forms of consideration prescribed by the law as essential for a lease. The following are the elements of rent as defined by the section:

(1) It must be a consideration for the transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property for a certain time or in perpetuity.
(2) It must be money, share of crops, service or other thing of value. (See Note 61.)
(3) It must be rendered periodically or on specified occasions.
(4) The rendering must be to the lessor by the lessee. (See Note 60.)

The definition of rent in Woodfall's 'Law of Landlord and Tenant' is also similar.[1] But as a further element it seems to be required that the rent should be a source of 'profit' to the lessor.) See Note 60 for a further discussion of this point.)

The definition of rent in various local Tenancy Acts[2] corresponds in essential particulars with the definition under this section. But 'service' is not included as rent in such local Acts.

Tenancy Acts essentially dealing, as they do, only with tenancy of 'land,' the definition of rent in such Acts describes it as something rendered to the landlord by the tenant on account of occupation of 'land.'

The first essential in the definition of rent is, as seen above, that it is a consideration for the transfer of a right to enjoy immovable property. It has been seen in Note 3 that such right is an 'interest' in immovable property created in particular modes. Hence, before there can be any question of rent, there must be a transfer of this description. Otherwise the payment will not be rent. Thus, licence fee is not rent, because licence does not involve a transfer of any interest in immovable property.[3] Similarly, the amount payable under a collateral agreement in consideration of the grant of the lease is not rent, because such agreement does not, by itself, create an interest in the property.[4] For other instances see the cases cited below.[5]

The next point is that the payment must be a consideration for the 'transfer.' Every payment that is to be made under a lease is not necessarily 'rent.' Thus, if the lessee has agreed to accept, in consideration of the lease, certain goods to be supplied by the lessor or certain services to be rendered by him and to pay for such goods or services, such payment is not consideration for the lease but for the goods or services, though it is made under the terms of the lease.[6]

Similarly, where a grant is made by the holder of an impartible estate for the maintenance of a junior member of the family, and as the income from the village set apart for maintenance is expected to exceed the proposed amount of maintenance, the grantee is required under the grant to pay to the grantor annually a certain sum of money, such sum cannot be said to be rent, as it is not the 'consideration' for the transfer, such consideration being the giving up by the grantee of his claim for maintenance.[7]

Rent being one of the 'essential' elements of a lease (unless there is a premium) there must be 'certainty' about the rent in the lease.[8] Otherwise, the lease will be void.[9] But though the exact amount is not stated, if it is capable of ascertainment, it is enough.[10] Further, the mere fact of rent being fluctuating does not make it uncertain. Thus, if a lease for a term certain provides that the rent should be increased at a certain rate at certain intervals, the rent is not uncertain.[11]

Rent under the Act being purely a matter of 'contract' the Court has no power to go behind the contract between the parties and pass a decree for what it considers to be a fair and equitable rent.[12]

So long as the contract of tenancy subsists, the liability of the tenant to pay rent continues. If he has any right to repudiate the tenancy on the ground of fraud, etc., he must do so in regard to the entire property and not with regard to only a portion of it. Though he may give up possession of any portion of the property and profess to repudiate the tenancy in respect of such portion, he will be liable for the whole of the stipulated rent.[13]

A covenant to pay rent is one running with the land. (See S. 40, Note 25.) Hence, the 'assignee' of a lease is liable to pay rent to the lessor.[14]

In a suit for rent, the landlord has to prove the existence of the relationship of landlord and tenant between him and the defendant. That means that he has to show that he has demised the property to the defendant on the terms alleged by him. It is not necessary for him to set out his 'title' to the property because the tenant is estopped under S. 116 of the Evidence Act from denying such title.[15]

A decree for rent necessarily implies a decision that the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the parties and will be 'res judicata' in a future suit for rent.[16]

60. Rent—Illustrative cases.—One essential feature of rent, as has been seen in Note 59, is that it is something paid or given in consideration of the grant of the lease. In other words, the alleged rent must be consideration for the right of occupation which is transferred to the lessee. There may be an item payable by the lessee to the lessor under the terms of the lease but it may not be rent in the above sense. Thus, if the payment is in return of services to be rendered or goods supplied by the grantor of the right, such payment will not be rent, although the acceptance and payment for such services or goods may be part of the arrangements embodied in the lease.[1] It is a question depending on the facts and circumstances of each case whether a particular item is rent or not. If the item satisfies the above test, it is rent irrespective of its description by the parties. Thus, where a cash rent was fixed and besides, it was provided that certain fixed quantities of named commodities must also be supplied by the tenant to the landlord every year, it was held on construction of the leases in question that such commodities formed part of the 'rent,' although they were not described as such.[2]

But, in the undermentioned cases,[3] such an item was held on the construction of the particular lease not to be rent. In the cases cited below,[4] "collection charges" were held to be rent on the application of the test stated above.

In the undermentioned case[5] it was held that a certain annual payment called 'muhatarifa' to be made by certain non-agricultural raiyats in occupation of house sites in the village abadi was rent.

The section says that the rent is something to be paid or rendered to the transferor, i. e., the 'lessor.' This question is involved in cases in which the item is of the nature of a tax or other public charge in respect of the property or (in the case of an underlease) relates to the rent payable to the superior landlord. It seems to be clear that an item does not cease to be payable to the lessor merely because it is paid on his behalf (under his authority or under the terms of the lease) to a third person or body. This view finds support from a decision of the Privy Council in which it was held that the remuneration payable to village officers by a tenant in a zamindari was paid by him only as 'agent' of the zamindar and when the Government relieved the zamindar of the burden of paying the village officers, the tenant was not entitled to any deduction from his dues to the zamindar.[6] On this principle, there seems to be no difficulty in holding that an amount payable to the Government or other public authority on behalf of the landlord is rent, provided that the payment is on the construction of the lease in question a part of the consideration for the lease. This view was taken in the cases mentioned below[7] in which such amounts were held to be rent. A similar principle will apply also to a sum payable by an under-lessee to the superior landlord.[8]

But there are certain decisions which are inconsistent with the above view. Some of these decisions proceed on the particular facts of the case and hold that the sum in question does not form part of the consideration for the lease.[9] But they also advert to the aspect that the payment is not made to the landlord. As stated already, this ground does not seem to be a sound one.

Some of the decisions proceed on the ground that the payment is not a 'profit' in the landlord's hand.[10] They are based upon the conception of rent as given by Woodfall in his 'Law of Landlord and Tenant.' But there does not seem to be any reason for reading this idea into the definition of rent under this section. Some decisions have even gone to the length of holding that a letting on payment of the 'bare' assessment on the land would be a lease.[11] This view seems to be quite justified by the wording of the section.[12] Nor does there seem to be any difference in this respect between the definition under this section and the definition of rent contained in some of the Provincial Tenancy Acts.

'Tagore v. Bibi Jarao'[13] is a decision of the Privy Council in which it was held that the Government assessment payable by the tenant under the lease was not part of the 'rent.' This decision is based purely on the construction of the lease in question. It no doubt refers to the consideration that the relevant section, namely, S. 3 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, requires the payment to be made to the 'landlord' in order to constitute rent. But it must only be taken to mean that the payment in question was not intended to be made to the Government by the tenant as the landlord's agent, i. e., out of a fund due to the landlord.

Where, on an adjustment of accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant is found liable for a certain amount on account of rent out of which a certain sum is left with him in deposit for payment to the superior landlord on account of rent payable by the plaintiff, such sum will not be rent where the facts show that there is a 'discharge' of the lessee's obligation so far as that portion of the sum is concerned, by the adjustment of accounts.[14]

The question whether a certain item payable under a lease is rent or not is material under some of the local laws which prohibit or restrain the levy of any sum other than rent by the landlord. Their object is to prevent oppression of tenants by lanlords.[15]

If an amount payable under a lease to a third party, e. g., Government assessment or rent due to the superior landlord, is found on construction of the particular lease in question not to be 'rent,' then the lessor's remedy against the lessee on the latter's default is by means of a suit for damages for breach of contract. It has been held that in such cases not merely nominal damages but the full amount payable to the third party is recoverable as damages.[16]

As to whether a maintenance grant under which the grantee is to pay an annual sum to the grantor is a lease and as to whether such sum is rent, see Note 68.

61. Forms of rent.—Rent need not be 'money.'[1] The section expressly provides that rent may be in the form of money, a share of crops, service or any other thing of value. Premium, however, can only be in money. (See Note 58.) This also seems to be the conception of rent under the English law. The difinitions of rent under the various Provincial Tenancy Acts also include rent in money as well as in kind but not in the form of service. The rent may be partly in one of these forms and partly in another.[2] But unless the consideration takes one of these forms, it will not be rent.[3] In the case of "share of crops" it is clear, it should be a share of the crops of the demised field. But in the case of other things, there is no restriction that it must come out of the property leased. But, in a case under the United Provinces Land Revenue Act of 1901, one of the reasons for holding that the articles agreed to be delivered by the tenant to the landlord in that case constituted "cesses" and not "rent" was that such articles were not the produce of the field leased.[4] But it cannot be said to have been intended to be laid down that this is a 'conclusive' test of rent. Even the definitions of rent in the various Provincial Tenancy Acts do not restrict rent in kind to things produced on the land demised. But the question if the article is a product of the demised field or not may be 'one' of the matters to be considered in determining if it was a part of the 'consideration' for the lease.

62. Rent in kind — Payment of money value. — Where a lease deed fixes a money rent but provides that a certain quantity of grain or other commodity may be delivered in lieu of it, the lessor is entitled on default by the lessee, to recover only the stipulated sum of money and not the market-value of the article.[1]

Where a lease-deed fixes rent in kind or partly in kind and partly otherwise, but states also the money value of the thing to be delivered, the question arises whether on default by the lessee, the lessor is entitled to the sum mentioned in the lease as the value or is entitled to the 'market-value' of the thing at the date on which its delivery was due. This is entirely a matter of construction of the particular lease, the question in each case being whether the value of the article is mentioned in the lease-deed merely by way of 'description' or is 'fixed' as an alternative form, in which the rent is to be recovered. In the former case, the market-value, and in the latter case the sum fixed in the lease-deed would be recoverable. The decisions on the subject have been classified on the above lines in the foot-note below.[2]

Unless the rent is fixed in the form of two 'equal' alternatives, the lessor is entitled to a decree in the first instance, for the particular thing and not for its value.[3]

63. Rent — Service as rent. — The section expressly recognises the rendering of service as a form of rent and so a lease in consideration of service to be rendered is valid.[1] But service 'can' also be the consideration for the grant of a 'licence' to occupy property. As to when occupation in lieu of service will be a lease and when it will be a licence, see Note 16.

64. Variation of rent.—Rent under this section is a matter of contract and once fixed it cannot be altered, so long as the lease continues, except by agreement.[1] Hence, the Court has no power to pass a decree for a fair and equitable rent by going behind the terms of the agreement between the parties. (See Note 59.)

The proof of an agreement varying the rent payable under a lease is subject to the provisions of S. 92 of the Evidence Act. For instance, in the case of a registered lease, a subsequent oral agreement to raise or lower the rent is not admissible in evidence.[2] As to whether an agreement varying the terms of a lease as to rent is itself a lease, see Note 11.

Where the original lease itself provides for a varying or fluctuating rent, there is no objection to such variation provided that there is no uncertainty about the matter. See Note 59.

In the case of agricultural tenancies not governed by this Act, the Court has power under some of the local laws to award a fair and equitable rent in variation of the agreement between the parties. In Bengal a zamindar under the Permanent Settlement is presumed to be entitled to vary the rent from time to time up to the limit allowed by the current rates prevailing in the purgana. But the parties can agree to have a fixed rent not liable to variation.[3]

65. Rent-free grants.—A right to a rent-free grant may be acquired by grant or prescription. As will be seen in Note 79, a tenant, although originally liable to pay rent, may, by refusing to the landlord his enjoyment of the right to rent within Art. 131 of the Limitation Act, prescribe for the right to hold the property rent-free.[1] A rent-free grant may also be proved on the principle of lost grant[2] discussed in Note 44.

66. Interest on rent. — The statutory definition of mesne profits in S. 2 (12) of the Civil Procedure Code includes interest on mesne profits within the meaning of the expression. But this section does not specifically refer to interest on arrears of rent as part of rent. The question whether interest is 'payable' on rent is one of 'contract.'

Is interest agreed to be paid on arrears of rent a 'part' of the rent? It has been held by the Calcutta High Court that such interest is not rent.[1] The decision follows two earlier decisions of the same Court, in which it was held that interest on rent is not an "amount of rent annually payable" within the meaning of section 153 of the Bengal Tenancy Act.[2]

67. Lease for a premium and usufructuary mortgage—Distinction.—The points of distinction between a lease for a premium and a usufructuary mortgage are as follows:

(1) A lease for a premium is a transfer of the right to 'enjoy' the property. Under such a lease, the usufruct of the property will belong to the lessee till the lease is determined. But under a usufructuary mortgage only the right to 'possession' is transferred to the mortgagee. The usufruct of the property will not 'belong' to the mortgagee. He will have only the right to receive it. He must adjust it towards the mortgage-debt. This is the principle even in cases in which the mortgagee's remaining in possession and appropriating the profits of the property for a certain period is to wipe out 'ipso facto' the mortgage-debt without his being liable to account for such profits during that period. (See Note 5.)

(2) A usufructuary mortgage connotes a transfer of an interest in the 'fee simple' in the property, though not the entire fee simple or ownership of the property. The interest in immovable property which, according to the definition of a mortgage in S. 58, is transferred to the mortgagee is an interest in the 'fee simple.' But the interest transferred under a lease for a premium is not an interest in the fee simple. It is merely 'a right to the enjoyment' of the property. (See Note 6.)

(3) The premium for a lease is a 'price' paid or promised for the lease. But the consideration for a usufructuary mortgage is the advancement of a 'loan.'

(4) The transfer of an interest under a usufructuary mortgage is for the purpose of securing repayment of the loan. There is no such object in a lease. It is this difference that is at the root of the difference mentioned in item (1) above.

The above points of difference are involved in the very definition of the two kinds of transactions. The following points of difference in regard to their 'incidents' may also be noted :

(1) A provision entitling the transferee to continue in possession of the property after the term fixed for the mortgage, even if the mortgage-debt should be repaid to the mortgagee within such term, would be void as being a clog on the equity of redemption. But a provision, enabling the lessee to hold the property even after the term fixed for the lease would not be invalid.[1]

(2) A usufructuary mortgagee is entitled to remain in possession as long as the debt is not repaid, though the term of the mortgage may have expired. But a lessee is not entitled to remain in possession after the expiry of the term of the lease.[2]

(3) A clause prohibiting a transfer of the lease, when it is inserted for the benefit of the lessor, is valid. But a clause prohibiting a mortgagee from transferring his interest under the mortgage would be invalid.[3]

The question, whether a particular transaction is a lease for a premium or a usufructuary mortgage, is one of construction in each case. It must be seen whether the money paid is a loan advanced or price paid and whether possession of property is transferred for the purpose of securing the repayment of a loan.[4] If the money paid is a loan advanced and the transfer of possession is for the purpose of securing the repayment of such loan, the transaction would be a usufructuary mortgage.[5] But if the money is paid of such provisions may 'prima facie' indicate the transaction to be a lease.[11] Thus, where the stipulation is that the transferee is to remain in possession for a fixed term of years and then vacate the property irrespective of the question whether the amount paid by him has been recouped by him from the profits of the property or not, the transaction may 'prima facie' be held to be a lease.[12] But the test is not a conclusive one. Thus, where it was provided that the transferee was to be in possession for a certain period in lieu of the money paid by him but that if he was dispossessed in the meanwhile, he was to be entitled to recover the amount with interest, it was held that the transaction was a mortgage.[13]

In the undermentioned case,[14] where the transferee was placed in possession of the property for a term of years in discharge of the amount paid by him and there was no provision either for interest or redemption or rent and the document was described as a mortgage, it was held that the transaction was a mortgage and not a lease.

Where the transferee is to remain in possession till the amount paid by him is fully recovered from the usufruct of the property, the transaction may be taken to be a mortgage.[15]

Where rent is payable by the transferee, the transaction is indicated to be a 'lease.'[16] Where otherwise a transaction is shown to be a lease, the fact that the lessor is a debtor of the lessee and that the rent payable by the latter is to be adjusted to the interest payable by the lessor[17] or that the principal itself is to be deemed as repaid by the adjustment of such rent for a certain number of years[18] will not alter the character of the transaction.

68. Maintenance grants.—Where land is granted for the purpose of providing maintenance to the grantee, the question arises as to whether such a grant is to be treated as a 'lease.' There can be no general rule in such cases and the nature of the grant must be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances of each case. Because, though the purpose of the grant may be similar, the facts material for the determination of the question whether the grant fulfils the requirements of a 'lease' are bound to differ. For instance, in the case of 'Sonet Kooer v. Himmut Bahadur'[1] the Privy Council held a maintenance grant to be a grant of an 'absolute' interest. But in the undermentioned cases[2] such a grant was assumed to be a 'lease.' No doubt, these cases relate to grants made before the passing of the Act. But they show that though the purpose of a grant may be similar the nature of the grant may differ.

The decision of the Privy Council in 'Sonet Kooer's case[2a] brings home the point that if a grant for maintenance is of an 'absolute' character, i. e., if it creates an interest in the 'fee simple or ownership' of property, it would not be a 'lease,' not even a permanent lease. Similarly, it was doubted by Varadachariar, J., in the undermentioned decision[3] whether there is any intention of creating the relationship of landlord and tenant between a zamindar and the junior member of his family in whose favour he makes a grant for the purpose of his maintenance.

It seems fairly clear that ordinarily such grants would not be mere 'licences.' The intention may generally be presumed to be to create an 'interest' in the property.

One important question which arises in regard to such cases is whether a grant for maintenance is one made for a 'consideration' and if so, if the consideration can be said to be of the particular kind which this section requires in order to make the transfer a lease. A grant in lieu of maintenance cannot be said to be 'without' consideration when it is made in favour of a person who is entitled to a legal right of maintenance.[4] But the consideration cannot be said to be either 'premium' or 'rent' as required by this section and unless there are special factors which make the grant a lease, a giving up of the claim for maintenance will not, by itself, make the transaction a 'lease.'[5]

Even if an annual sum is made payable by the grantee to the grantor under the terms of the grant, the grant cannot be considered to be a lease, unless it appears in the peculiar circumstances of a case that such payment forms the consideration for the grant. Normally, it will not be such consideration, the consideration in such cases being the giving up of the claim of maintenance.[6]

A maintenance grant made before the coming into force of this Act 'could' be a lease even though there was no other consideration than the provision of maintenance for a person entitled to demand it, as there was no statutory definition of a lease at that time.[7]

Under the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, it has been held that no consideration is necessary for the creation of a tenancy. Hence, the grantee under a maintenance grant can be a tenant under that Act.[8]

It would seem that ordinarily a grant for the maintenance of a person would be tenable for the lifetime of the grantee, though it 'can' be made hereditary by express or implied provision.[9] In 'Sonet Kooer's case,'[10] above referred to, the grant was held to be an 'absolute hereditary' grant, i. e., not a lease at all.

in consideration of service to be rendered by the grantee, the grant may fall under either of the two following classes:

(a) It may be a grant in lieu of wages for the services to be rendered. The grant of an office, the performance of whose duties is to be remunerated by the enjoyment of certain lands, will fall under this class.

(b) It may be a grant burdened with the performance of service.

In class (a) it is an implied condition of the grant that if the services are not performed or are not required the grant can be resumed.

In class (b) 'prima facie' the grant is not resumable even though the services may not be required. But an intention that the grant is to be resumable when the services are not required may appear from the provisions of the grant. Such intention may be express or implied. For instance, if the whole motive and consideration for a grant is the performance of the service, it may be presumed that the intention was that the services ceasing, the grant should be resumable. But where the grant is made partly as a reward for past services and partly in consideration of future services to be rendered, the grant will be presumed as not resumable even though the services may not be required. In such a case if owing to a change in circumstances the services are no longer required, the grant will continue practically freed from the liability of rendering the service.

One test to see if a grant is one in lieu of wages or one burdened with service is whether the service to be rendered is public or private. In the former case, the grant will 'prima facie' be treated as being one burdened with service and not one in lieu of wages. In the latter case, the grant will be 'prima facie' treated as one in lieu of wages and therefore resumable.

The above principles have been laid down in a series of decisions of the Privy Council,[1] beginning from 'Forbes v. Mir Mahomed Taki'[2] which is also the leading decision on the subject, and have been followed by various decisions of the High Courts.[3] It may be that the grants in some of the

In the other, persons are entitled to hold land as tenants with an added condition that they shall pay no rent so long as they perform certain services, the exemption but not the tenure being dependent on the services and ending with them.)]

Hence, where a lease is granted 'in consideration' of services to be rendered by the lessee, i. e., in lieu of wages for such services, the lease will be presumed to be subject to the condition that on failure of the lessee to render the service the lease can be determined by the lessor. The cases cited below fall under this principle.[6] See also the undermentioned decision.[7]

It may be noted that a lease in lieu of service will be a valid lease though a definite period is not fixed in advance for the duration of the lease. As seen in Note 25, the fixing of such period is not necessary for a lease. It will also be noted that service is a valid form of rent under the section.

70. Damages for use and occupation.—A claim for damages for use and occupation arises under the following circumstances—

(1) the defendant must be in possession of the plaintiff's immovable property;[1]

(2) the possession of the defendant must be with the 'permission' of the plaintiff; and

(3) there must be 'no' relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties.[2]

S. 105—NOTE 70

1. A claim for rent may be tenable notwithstanding that the tenant has not been in actual possession of the land. The reason is that a claim for rent is based on the contract of tenancy. See 8 Cal 118 which shows this. In that case, the tenant was held to be liable for rent for the whole of the demised land, although he was not in possession of a substantial portion of it. This shows that want of actual possession is not necessarily and always a ground for refusing to pass a decree for rent. But a claim for use and occupation will necessarily fail if there is no possession.

In such cases the 'law' implies[3] a contract for the payment of compensation for use and occupation, although there may be no actual contract. But the circumstances must not be inconsistent with the raising of such a contract by implication. For instance, if there is an 'express' contract providing for a certain amount of consideration to be paid in return for the use of one's immovable property, the implied contract under the law cannot arise, although the relationship between the parties may not amount to that of landlord and tenant. Similarly, if the permission is intended to be 'gratis', there can be no right to any damages for use and occupation.

Where A has granted a lease of his immovable property to B, A cannot sue C, a 'third' person who may be actually in possession for damages for use and occupation.[4] The reason is that his occupation cannot be with the 'permission' of A. A mere demand of rent from the person in possession will not make his possession permissive so as to make him liable for damages for use and occupation.[5]

A lessee holding over after the expiry of his lease without the assent of the landlord will not be liable for damages for use and occupation because his continuing in possession is not with the 'permission' of the landlord. (See Note 40.)

Where a person enters into possession under an agreement for the grant of a lease and the lease is not actually granted, he will be liable for damages for use and occupation.[6] (See Note 4.) So also a person in possession under a void lease will be liable for damages for use and occupation.[7]

A 'trespasser,' i. e., one who occupies land without the owner's permission and without any right cannot be sued for damages for 'use and occupation.' He will be liable for 'mesne profits.' But the owner can 'waive' the trespass and claim compensation for use and occupation.[8] The position in such cases is this. The cause of action against a trespasser is based on 'tort' and not on 'contract.' An action for compensation for use and occupation is treated as based on 'contract,' as the 'law' implies such a contract, where the possession of the defendant is with the permission of the plaintiff. Even where such possession is not with the plaintiff's permission, it is open to him under the law to waive the tort or the wrong committed against him and sue, as if there was a permission, so that the action would be based on an implied contract as above explained. But the fact that he does so will not create a 'tenancy' between the parties, and a suit for possession against the occupant will not be barred by his having adopted the above procedure.[9]

The above discussion shows that it is only a 'licensee' that may be liable for damages for use and occupation, and neither a tenant nor a trespasser.

Suppose, a suit for 'rent' is brought against a person in possession of one's property, but the alleged tenancy is not established. In such a case, can the suit be converted into one for damages for 'use and occupation?' On this question the decisions are not uniform.[10] It is clear that the causes of action for a suit for rent and a suit for damages for use and occupation are different. The former is based on the 'existence' of a tenancy, while the latter is based on the 'absence' of a tenancy. The question, whether amendment of the suit should be allowed in such cases, falls within the province of the Civil Procedure Code. For a consideration of the principles applying to such matters, reference may be made to the Notes on O. 6 R. 17 of the A.I.R. Commentaries on the Code of Civil Procedure, 4th (1944) Edition.

between the parties.[1] (See also Note 79.) Under S. 109 of the Evidence Act, where it is established that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the parties at a certain time, the burden of proving that the relationship has since ceased is on the party affirming the same.[2]

A clause in a lease entitling the lessor to re-enter on breach of certain conditions will not entitle him to re-enter 'by force.'[3] Even a licence by the lessee to the lessor to eject him without process of law would be void and would be no answer to a charge of forcible entry. Such a licence would be contrary to public policy as being likely to lead to a breach of the public peace.[4]

72. Heritability of lease.—A lease is 'prima facie' a heritable right.[1] Section 111 shows that the death of the lessee will not necessarily terminate a lease. This is in keeping with the nature of a lease as an 'interest' in immovable property and not merely a 'personal' right of the grantee. Hence, on the death of a tenant for a term of years, his interest will survive to his legal representatives.[2] Even where a lease is not for a 'fixed' term of years, it is a heritable right.[3] Thus, a lease from month to month is a heritable interest.[4]

But the above does not mean that a lease must 'always' be heritable.[5] Thus, a lease for the life of the grantee is a valid lease under the law and such a lease will obviously terminate on the death of the lessee.[5a] Similarly, a tenancy at will is regarded as not being a heritable interest.[6] (See Note 32.) In such cases the intention of the parties may be presumed to be that the interest is to last only till the lessee's death.

The question whether there is sufficient reason to hold that a lease confers only an interest to last during the lifetime of the grantee depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.[7] Thus, where a village was conveyed "subject to faithful service," it was held that, in the absence of words showing an intention to make the grant hereditary, it must be held to be one ceasing on the death of the grantee.[8] The fact that the lease has been granted for a residential or building purpose is generally regarded as indicating an intention to confer a hereditary interest.[9] The term "mokarari" by itself does not show that a lease is a hereditary one.[10] (For further information see Note 47.)

There is one general rule of construction of grants which has to be referred to here. This rule was enunciated by the Privy Council in 'Lakhraj Roy v. Kunhya Singh'[11] as follows:

> "If a grant be made to a man for an indefinite period, it enures, generally speaking, for his lifetime, and passes no interest to his heirs, unless there are some words showing an intention to grant a hereditary interest. That rule of construction does not apply if the term for which the grant is made is fixed or can be definitely ascertained."

On the above rule of construction, if a lease is granted for an indefinite period, i. e., where the intention of the lessor is that the lease is to go on for an indefinite period, the lease will generally be regarded as conferring only a life-interest on the lessee, unless there is sufficient reason to suppose that a hereditary interest was granted.[12]

But as the Privy Council themselves have pointed out in the passage quoted above, the rule of construction referred to by them will not apply, where the term, for which the lease has been granted, is fixed or can be definitely ascertained. On this principle it was held in the above case by the Privy Council that, where the intention of the grantor is to create an interest which is to last as long as his own interest in the property, the period of the lease is capable of ascertainment by reference to such interest and hence, in such a case, the abovementioned rule, making the grant only a 'life-estate,' does not apply.[13]

The decision of the Privy Council in the above case shows that the period, for which a grant has been made, may be regarded as capable of being definitely ascertained, even though on the date of the grant the exact duration for which the grant will, continue is not certain, provided that it will 'become' certain at a future date on the happening of a certain event. Thus, in the above decision the grant was intended to continue so long as the grantor's own interest in the property lasted. But the grantor's interest in the property was of such a nature that on the date of the grant, it could not be definitely foretold how long it would continue. Because, the grantor's interest was a lease from the Government, which (though hereditary and allowed to go on indefinitely) was liable to be terminated at any time by the Government. Nevertheless, it was held by the Privy Council that the term, for which the grant (by the lessee from the Government) was made, was capable of being definitely ascertained by reference to the interest, which the grantor himself had in the property. Evidently, their Lordships intended to lay down that the rule as to the construction of grants for an indefinite period will not apply where the parties have shown their intention that the grant is to continue in force up to a certain limit of time, although such limit is not fixed absolutely but is made to depend on the happening of some collateral' event in the future.

It may be noted that, though the lease in favour of the 'grantor,' in the above decision of the Privy Council, was liable to be terminated by the 'lessor' (the Government) at any time, it was regarded as a heritable and transferable interest. This shows that even a lease, which is to go on 'indefinitely' subject to the liability of being terminated at any time by the parties, is to be regarded as a lease under which a 'term is fixed,' so as to make such interest a heritable one and not merely a life-interest.

Even where a lease is not heritable, if the tenant's heir continues in possession after the tenant's death and the landlord acknowledges the heir as his tenant, a new tenancy may arise by implication.[14] (See Note 38.)

Incidentally, it may be noted that the view of the Privy Council in the decision referred to above as to the question when the term of a lease can be said to be definitely ascertainable is exactly similar to the meaning of the words "certain time" in this section as explained in Note 25.

law of landlord and tenant is loosely applied to such relationship.[1] The reason is that the ryot's right to 'possession' of the land is ordinarily not one 'derived' from the zamindar, so that there is no 'transfer' of the right of possession in such cases.[2] Hence, if such a ryot sets up permanent occupancy rights, the ordinary presumption applicable to cases of landlord and tenant that a tenancy of agricultural land is presumed to be one from year to year, until the contrary is established (so that the burden of proof is on the tenant to establish his claim to a permanent right) does not apply.[3] But 'ryotwari' pattadars are entitled to the actual possession of the land and the right of a tenant holding under them is only a 'derivative' right, i. e., there is a 'transfer' of such right by the ryotwari pattadar in such cases. The relationship of landlord and tenant exists in such cases, and the above-mentioned presumption will apply to them.[4]

The rule that a tenant's possession cannot be adverse to the landlord during the continuance of the tenancy can also be traced to other principles. These are:

(1) A tenant is estopped from denying the ownership of the lessor. This principle is embodied in S. 116 of the Evidence Act. It will be noted that this principle only precludes the tenant from denying the 'ownership' of the landlord. It does not preclude the tenant from asserting a lesser right although such right may be higher than the one conferred by the lease. But the principle above referred to, namely, that possession referable to a lawful title cannot be adverse comes in the way of the tenant doing so.

(2) The possession of the tenant is 'permissive' i. e., not in denial of the title of the lessor, but in consonance with it.

(3) So long as the tenancy is outstanding the lessor cannot sue the tenant for possession. If it is held that his possession can become adverse even before the tenancy ends, the result will be that limitation will begin to run against the landlord at a time when he has no right of suit at all—a result which is repugnant to the law. This aspect of the matter is pointed out by the Privy Council in 'Beni Pershad v. Dudhnath Roy.[7]

(4) Adverse possession implies a present right to possession in another person. (See the A. I. R. Commentaries on the Limitation Act, 2nd (1942) Edn., Arts. 142 & 144, Note 78.) But so long as tenancy continues, the right to possession is vested in the tenant and not in the landlord.

But where the tenant refuses to the landlord the "enjoyment of his right" to the rent reserved by the lease, such right will, under Art. 131 read with S. 28 of the Limitation Act, be extinguished at the end of twelve years from such refusal.[8] To constitute "refusal of enjoyment" of the right within the meaning of the Article, mere non-payment of rent is not enough. There must be a demand and refusal[9] and a denial of the landlord's title to the rent.[10] It must be noted that the effect of Art. 131 si 'not' to make the tenant's possession of the 'leased property' adverse to the landlord from the date of the refusal by the tenant. The subject-matter of adverse possession in such cases is the right to the 'rent' of the leased property. Such right is itself a kind of property,[11] (apart from the leased property) which is capable of adverse possession by the lessee or a stranger.

It is sometimes held or assumed that there can be adverse possession by a tenant in respect of the land covered by the lease even during the continuance of the lease.

It is said or implied that an open assertion of a hostile title or open repudiation of the landlord's title may make the possession of the tenant adverse to the landlord.[12] In 'Fatesingji v. Bamanji'[13] it was held that although a tenant cannot prescribe by adverse possession for title as 'full owner,' a tenant who is not a permanent tenant can, by adverse possession for twelve years, convert his tenancy into a permanent tenancy. The judgment proceeds on the ground that S. 116 of the Evidence Act precludes the tenant only from asserting a right to the 'ownership' of the property. It is submitted that such decisions are contrary to sound principle. They fail to take note of the principle (above referred to) under which the tenant is 'precluded' during the continuance of the tenancy from claiming adversely to the landlord. This principle is wider than S. 116 of the Evidence Act.

In 'Mumtaz Ali v. Mohan Singh'[14] the Privy Council observed that the mere assertion in a judicial proceeding of an underproprietary title by tenant would not deprive the landlord of his proprietary rights and continued as follows: "The case might have been different if, in addition to the judicial assertion by the plaintiff, there had been any change in the money payment which he thereafter made to his landlord." It is submitted that the above observations of the Privy Council do not mean that the possession of the 'leased property' by a tenant would become adverse to the landlord, if the assertion of a higher title had been accompanied by a change in the money payment. There is no reason why a change in the money payment should make a difference in the character of the possession of the 'leased property.' As seen already, it is well established that mere non-payment of rent does not make such possession adverse to the landlord. All that the Privy Council says is that the landlord's "proprietary rights" might be affected in such a case. It is quite possible that their Lordships had in mind the landlord's right to the 'rent' reserved by the lease and meant to say that 'this' right might be affected in the circumstances stated. Such a view is quite understandable in the light of Art. 131 of the Limitation Act which has already been referred to.

It must also be mentioned that the decisions of the Privy Council in 'Ram Chunder v. Madho Kumari'[15] and 'Chidambara Sivaprakasa v. Veerama Reddi[16] do not affect the position that a tenant cannot during the 'continuance' of the tenancy prescribe by adverse possession for any higher title than that conferred by the lease. 'Ram Chunder v. Madho Kumari' was the case of a tenant by sufferance continuing in possession 'after' the determination of the tenancy. There is nothing to show that in 'Chidambara Sivaprakasa v. Veerama Reddi,' the permanent tenancy was acquired by prescription by persons who had 'entered' as 'tenants.'

80. Nature of tenant's possession after determination of tenancy—Adverse possession. — Where a lessee continues in possession after the determination of the lease without the assent of the landlord, time begins to run in his favour under Art. 139 of the Limitation Act. Under that Article read with S. 28 of that Act the ex-lessee will acquire at the end of twelve years from the determination of the tenancy, such right to the property as he has been claiming while in possession. If the ex-lessee has been in possession in the assertion of a right to the full ownership, he can acquire such right at the end of the statutory period. If he has been asserting any lesser right, he can acquire such lesser right.[1] 'But this is a part from any question of adverse possession.' It is purely as the effect of the above two provisions that such a result occurs.

But 'can' a tenant's possession after the determination of the tenancy be adverse to the landlord and if so, to what extent? As seen in Note 37 the tenant's possession in such cases is 'wrongful.' But it is not 'ipso facto adverse' to the landlord. Nor 'can' it be adverse to the 'full' extent. In other words, such possession can be adverse to the landlord to a limited extent but not to the full extent so as to enable the ex-tenant to prescribe for 'full ownership' by adverse possession. Hence, 'but for Art. 139 read with S. 28,' a tenant continuing in possession after the determination of the tenancy for any length of time would not be able to acquire by prescription a title to the 'full ownership' of the property. But he can, 'independently of Art. 139.'

acquire by adverse possession a title to a 'lesser' interest in the property although such interest may be higher than that under the expired tenancy.

This position results like this: After the determination of the tenancy, the principle referred to in Note 79, that possession referable to a lawful title cannot be adverse, does not apply for the simple reason that the tenant's possession is no longer referable to a lawful title. But, though the above principle does not apply to such a case, the 'principle' of S. 116 of the Evidence Act applies. (The principle applies even after the tenancy has ceased, so long as the tenant has not surrendered possession.[2]) This principle precludes the ex-tenant from asserting a claim for the full 'ownership' of the property. But it does not preclude him from asserting a claim for a lesser title, say a title to permanent tenancy, although such title may be higher than that conferred by the expired lease.[3]

Even as to a limited extent, the tenant's possession does not 'ipso facto' become adverse to the landlord from the moment of the termination of the tenancy. The possession will not become adverse, till an adverse claim is actually put forward by the tenant against the landlord.[4]

A lessee who, after the determination of the tenancy, discontinues possession or is dispossessed but afterwards again enters into possession of the same property is in the position of a mere stranger and on the principles discussed in Note 84, he can prescribe by adverse possession for 'any' title which he may assert.[5]

Where a lessor assents to the continuation in possession of a tenant after the determination of the original tenancy, the tenancy is renewed under S. 116. In such cases, the principle which precludes a tenant from asserting a claim by adverse possession against his landlord during the continuance of the tenancy will come into play again, and there will be no adverse possession till the tenancy is determined.[6]

80a. Lease terminating on tenant's death—Tenant's legal representative continuing in possession—Nature of possession.—Where a lease terminates on the death of a tenant as in the case of a life-tenancy, and the legal representative of the deceased tenant continues in possession of the leased property, it is clear that his possession is one without any lawful title. The lessor can sue him for possession without giving him any notice to quit. As will be seen in Note 4 on S. 116, that section will not apply to such a case and consequently there will be no renewal of the lease in favour of the legal representative under S. 116 by the mere assent of the landlord to the legal representative's continuing in possession. But the actings of the parties may give rise to a fresh tenancy by implication on the principles discussed in Notes 7 and 8 or may give rise to an estoppel against the landlord on the principles referred to in Note 12. But even in the absence of such a fresh tenancy being established, the possession of the legal representative will not be 'ipso facto' adverse to the landlord, for the simple reason that the mere fact that A is in possession of B's property without title and without B's permission will not necessarily make such possession adverse to B in the absence of something to show that it is in active assertion of a hostile title.[1] Where, however, the legal representative asserts such a hostile right and claims to be in possession by virtue of such right his possession will be adverse to the landlord and the tenant will prescribe for such title as he has been asserting.[2]

81. Tenant encroaching on other land of the landlord — Adverse possession.—Where a tenant encroaches on other land of the lessor he does not thereby 'ipso facto' become a tenant of such land also. So, such land is not covered by the tenancy. The principles referred to in Note 79 which preclude a tenant from setting up adverse possession against the landlord during tenancy, therefore, do not apply to the tenant's possession of other land of the lessor on which the tenant encroaches. So, a tenant can set up adverse possession against the landlord in respect of such lands.[1] But there is a presumption that he claims to hold such land under the same terms as those under which he holds the lands covered by the lease. Hence, 'prima facie,' in regard to lands encroached upon by a tenant, he can acquire by adverse possession only such rights as he has in respect of the lands covered by the original tenancy.[2] But he 'can' prescribe for a higher title also by openly asserting such title to the 'knowledge' of the landlord.

82. Possession under invalid lease, how far adverse. — Where a person enters under a void lease his possession is not referable to any lawful title and so, he is not precluded, on the principle discussed in Note 79 from setting up adverse possession against the grantor of the lease. But he can set up such adverse possession only in regard to the interest attempted to be created by the void lease.[1] The reason is that having entered into possession under colour of a particular transaction he cannot afterwards set up another title to the property against such transaction, although it did not operate to pass title to him. (See the A. I. R. Commentaries on the Limitation Act, 2nd (1942) Edn., Arts. 142 & 144, Note 60.)

Reference may also be made in this connexion to S. 116 of the Evidence Act. As seen in Note 19, the person entering under a void lease is in the position of a licensee. Under S. 116 of the Evidence Act he cannot set up a right to the 'ownership' of the property. But that section does not prevent him from asserting a lesser right to the property. But the principle above referred to precludes him even from doing so, except to the extent of the interest purported to be created by the void lease.

Under the above principles, a person entering under a void lease can acquire by adverse possession the interest purported to be granted by such lease.[2] Thus, if the interest attempted to be created is a permanent tenancy, the person entering into possession under such transfer can prescribe for a permanent tenancy.[3] The same principle will apply 'mutatis mutandis,' where a transfer is valid for a time and becomes invalid subsequently. Thus, where a lease is valid only for the lifetime of the grantor or during the time that he holds a certain office or occupies a certain position, the lessee's possession after the death of the grantor or after he ceases to hold the office or occupy the position will be adverse to his successors from the moment of his death or ceasing to hold the office or occupy the position in question. Such a person would also be in the position of a person who continues in possession without the lessor's assent after the determination of the tenancy.

83. Dispossession of lessee by third person — Adverse possession. — Where a stranger dispossesses a lessee from the property and enters into possession of the property, the possession of such stranger is not adverse to the lessor so long as the tenancy is in force. The reason is that till the lease is determined the lessor is not entitled to possession.[1] (See the A. I. R. Commentaries on the Limitation Act, 2nd (1942) Edn., Arts. 142 & 144, Notes 78 and 86.)

84. Acquisition of tenancy by prescription by trespasser. — A 'limited' interest in immovable property can be acquired by adverse possession in the same way in which a right of 'ownership' can be acquired. Thus, a trespasser in possession under a claim of tenancy in respect of the land can acquire a right of 'tenancy' in the land by prescription.[1] If he has been in possession claiming a 'permanent tenancy,' he will be entitled, at the end of the statutory period to a permanent tenancy by prescription.[2]

85. Estoppel of tenant.—In a suit for ejectment by a landlord against a tenant after the tenancy has been terminated by a due notice to quit, the tenant cannot set up the title of a third person and contend that the land belongs to such third person and not to the plaintiff.[1] This is on the principle of estoppel contained in S. 116, Evidence Act, which runs as follows:

"No tenant of immoveable property, or person claiming through such tenant, shall, during the continuance of the tenancy, be permitted to deny that the landlord had, at the beginning of the tenancy, a title to such immoveable property; and no person who came upon any immoveable property by the licence of the person in possession thereof, shall be permitted to deny that such person had a title to such possession at the time when such licence was given."

1. Amendment of section.—See Note 45.

2. Contract to the contrary.—This section only applies in the absence of (inter alia) a "contract to the contrary".[1] A lease for a term certain, a perpetual lease, a lease for the life of the lessee, a tenancy-at-will, etc., are all leases in which there is a contract to the contrary within the meaning of the section. So also, where a lease is expressly made determinable by the lessor without any previous notice there is clearly a contract to the contrary under this section and no notice will be necessary to determine such a lease.[2-3] Similarly, where a lease is expressed to be determinable by notice but the notice is not of the kind required by this section there is a contract to the contrary within this section. Thus, the parties may provide for a longer[4] or shorter[5] notice than that required under the section for the determination of a lease. Similarly, a notice may be according to the contract between the parties although such notice does not expire with the end of a year or month of the tenancy.[6]

Where a contract of tenancy simply provides for a notice of a certain period which is different from the period of notice under this section there will be deemed to be a contract to the contrary within the meaning of this section not only with reference to the length of the notice required to determine the lease but also with reference to the time when the notice is to expire, although there is no specification in the contract as to such time. Hence in such a case the notice need not expire with a year or month of the tenancy.[7]

It has been held that where after the termination of a lease, the lessee holds over with the assent of the landlord and the lease is renewed from year to year or from month to month, a covenant in the original lease making it determinable without notice will also hold good in the case of the lease formed by holding over.[8] The reason given is that except as to the period of the lease, the lease by holding over will be governed by the same terms as the original lease.

The questions as to the nature of a tenancy and as to whether it involves a contract to the contrary within the meaning of the section are purely questions of construction depending on the facts and circumstances of each case. The undermentioned are some illustrative cases.[9]

3. Lease for a term certain—Notice.—Where a definite period is fixed as the term of a lease, there would be a "contract to the contrary" within the meaning of this section. A notice will not be necessary to determine the lease.[2] Similarly, such a lease cannot be determined before the end of the term fixed, by a notice to quit.[2a] After the expiration of the term fixed by the lease, the lessee continuing in possession, will, in the absence of an assent by the lessor or his representative in interest, only be a tenant by sufferance. He can be sued in ejectment at any time without any previous notice or demand of possession.[3] (See S. 105, Note 37.) As seen in Note 25 on S. 105, a lease need not be for a period which is certain on the date of the lease but it is sufficient if the period is fixed with reference to a future event on the happening of which the lease will be determined and the period of the lease will become certain. In such a case also the lease will come to an end on the happening of the event and no notice to quit would be necessary.[3a]

Where a lease for a term certain is granted in favour of A and then another lease is granted in favour of B to commence on the expiration of A's lease, B can sue A for possession after the period of A's lease has expired. B need not give any notice to quit to A before bringing such suit.[4]

Where, however, the tenancy is renewed from year to year or month to month under S. 116 read with this section, a notice will be necessary to determine such tenancy and the tenant cannot be sued in ejectment without such notice being given.[5] (See Notes on section 116.)

4. Lease for life.—A lease for the life-time of the tenant is obviously one in which there is a "contract to the contrary" within the meaning of this section. Such a lease cannot be determined by a mere notice to quit under this section. Nor will such a notice be necessary for bringing a suit for ejectment against the tenant's representatives, where the lease has terminated on the death of the tenant.[1] See also Note 34 on section 105.

5. Perpetual lease.—A perpetual lease necessarily involves a contract to the contrary within the meaning of this section and is not determinable by notice under this section.[1] But a perpetual lease cannot be created except by a registered instrument. Where a person alleges a perpetual lease for building purposes but there is no registered instrument it has been held that the oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession operates only to create a month to month tenancy under this section.[2]

Where a tenancy is established, the onus of proving that it is a perpetual tenancy is on the tenant. See S. 105, Note 43.

6. Tenancy at will.—Where the agreement between the parties is to the effect that the tenancy should be determinable by either party at any time, there is clearly a "contract to the contrary" within the meaning of this section. Hence, the provisions of this section will not apply to such leases. The tenancy in such cases will be what is known as a tenancy at will under the law. (See S. 105, Note 32.)

But a tenancy at will must be established by positive proof of a contract. Such a tenancy cannot be implied merely because the intention of the parties as to the duration of a lease cannot be definitely ascertained.[1] In such cases, there would be no contract to the contrary within the meaning of this section and the presumption of yearly or monthly tenancy under the section will apply.

But the agreement making a lease one at the will of the parties may be express or implied. Such agreement may be implied from words used as well as from the conduct of the parties and other circumstances. So the question, whether a lease is a tenancy at will, depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.

Where it was provided in a lease that the tenant would pay the monthly rent regularly and that in case of default for three months he would vacate the property, it was held that as soon as rent for three months fell into arrears the tenancy was reduced to one at will and that from that date the tenant could be ejected without any notice to quit.[1a]

Though ordinarily a tenancy at will is not a transferable interest, it may be transferable by special custom in any particular place. Hence, notwithstanding such transferability, a lease may be only a tenancy at will.[2]

Where a lessee enters into possession under a lease which requires registration but is not registered, the circumstances of a case may give rise, by implication, to a tenancy at will.[3] But it would be wrong to suppose that wherever a tenant enters under an invalid lease, there would ipso facto arise a tenancy at will. If a tenancy is implied from the circumstances in such cases, the prima facie presumption under this section would be in favour of its being a yearly or monthly tenancy and not a tenancy at will. Such a tenancy can arise only by positive proof of a contract and not by mere presumption of law.

A tenancy at will may go on for any length of time indefinitely. Hence, the mere fact that a tenancy has continued for a very long time is not a conclusive proof that it is not a tenancy at will.[4]

4. ('68) 10 Suth W R 477 (478) (DB), Sheo Dayal v. Mohabeer Pershad.

A tenancy at will can be determined by a notice to quit.[4a] But such a notice will not be necessary for the purpose.[5] A mere demand for possession will be sufficient to put an end to the tenancy.[6] Even where a notice is given, it need not comply with the requirements of this section. Such a notice need not be for the period prescribed by this section nor need it expire with the end of a year or month of the tenancy. A reasonable notice will be quite sufficient to determine the tenancy.[7]

But unless the lease is determined in some way, the lessee cannot be sued in ejectment.[8]

A tenancy at will is ordinarily determined by the death of the lessor,[9] or lessee.[10]

7. Lease for indefinite period.—Reference has been made in Note 26 on S. 105 to the rule of construction according to which a lease for an indefinite period would be construed as a lease for the life-time of the lessee. Hence, where this rule applies, there would be a "contract to the contrary" within the meaning of this section, although the lease is not for any definite period and the parties have not fixed any limit of time absolutely or relatively in regard to the lease.[1]

See also Note 72 on section 105.

8. Possession under agreement to grant lease for a term certain.—In the undermentioned case,[1] A agreed to take a lease of lands for a term of ten years and entered into possession of the lands. He paid rent as arranged but no lease was executed in his favour. It was held that this section did not apply to such a case as the agreement to grant a lease for ten years amounted to a "contract to the contrary" within the meaning of this section. It is submitted with respect that this view is not correct. The "contract to the contrary" referred to in the section is a contract forming part of the transaction of lease. In the above case, the tenancy formed by implication from payment and acceptance of rent is independent of the agreement to grant a lease for ten years and is not affected by such agreement.

9. Law to the contrary.—Where the right of a landlord to eject his tenant after determining the tenancy under the general law is interrupted by a temporary enactment, the right is revived on such enactment ceasing to be in force.[1]

10. Usage to the contrary.—The presumption as to the duration of a tenancy and its mode of determinability under this section will not apply to cases, where there is a usage to the contrary.[1] Thus, it has been held that according to local custom a month's notice to quit instead of 15 days notice as required by this section will probably be necessary to determine a tenancy of buildings in the city of Bombay.[2] But in the city of Calcutta there would seem to be no special custom extending the fifteen days' notice provided for by this section for monthly tenancies of buildings.[3] It has been held by the Sind Judicial Commissioner's Court that, where local custom requires a monthly tenancy to be determined by a month's notice, it need not be served in the manner prescribed by this section.[4] There being a "usage" to the contrary in such a case, the provisions of this section do not apply.

11. Immovable property.—A jalkar or right of fishery is "immovable property" within the meaning of this section.[1]

See also Notes on section 3.

12. Presumption of yearly or monthly tenancy under this section.—Under this section, in the absence of a contract, local law or usage to the contrary, a lease of immovable property for agricultural or manufacturing purposes should be deemed to be one from year to year and a lease for any other purpose should be deemed to be one from month to month. Hence, where there is no satisfactory evidence as to the period for which a lease has been granted, it will be deemed to be one from year to year[1] or one from month to month[2] according to the purpose of the lease, unless there is any local law or usage to the contrary.

In thus creating a presumption of yearly tenancy in regard to agricultural leases the section only gives effect to a principle generally recognised in India.[3]

Under this section, a lease which is not for agricultural or manufacturing purposes must be presumed to be one from month to month. This presumption will apply even to a building lease.[5] See also S. 105, Note 26.

13. This provision has to be read with S. 117, under which the provisions of this chapter will not apply to leases for agricultural purposes, except in so far as they may be made specially applicable by a notification of the Provincial Government. The result is that in the case of agricultural leases, the persumption of yearly tenancy under this section will apply only if the section has been made applicable to such leases by special notification above mentioned.[1] The principle of the section may be applied to such leases.[1a] See also S. 105, Note 1. The question whether a lease is for a manufacturing purpose, is one of fact.[3]

Where a lease is for a manufacturing purpose but the landlord gives only a notice of one month to terminate the lease and the tenant in his reply to that notice admits that he is a monthly tenant, this does not estop him from contending in a subsequent suit for ejectment against him, that the notice is not sufficient and that he is entitled to six months' notice.[4]

14. Lease for building purpose—Presumption as to.—See Note 12.

15. Reservation of yearly or monthly rent—Effect.—The reservation of a yearly rent would prima facie imply that a lease is not one from month to month but one from year to year.[1] Hence, where a lease is not for an agricultural or manufacturing purpose but a yearly rent is reserved under the lease, there would prima facie be a contract to the contrary within the meaning of this section, preventing the application of the presumption of monthly tenancy to such a lease. But a lease from year to year would require registration under S. 107. Hence, in such a case, if the lease is made by an oral agreement and delivery of possession and not by a registered deed there would be no lease from year to year notwithstanding the above implication. In other words, there would be no valid "contract to the contrary" in such a case within the meaning of this section. Hence, in such a case, the lease can be presumed to be one from month to month under this section notwithstanding the reservation of a yearly rent.[2] It has been held in the undermentioned case[2a] that in the circumstances described above there would be a valid lease for the first year and if after expiry of the first year the lessor accepts rent from the lessee and assents to his continuing in possession the lease would be renewed from month to month terminable by fifteen days' notice.

But apart from the above, the reservation of a yearly rent will not conclusively show in every case that the lease is one from year to year and a lease may be held not to be such a lease notwithstanding the reservation of such rent.[3]

The expression "ordinary tenant" used in a lease-deed with reference to house property in Calcutta prima facie indicates a monthly tenancy although there is no reference to payment of monthly rent.[4]

16. Lease from year to year. —The characteristics of such a lease have been discussed in Note 31 on S. 105. As pointed out in that Note, such a lease is intended to go on indefinitely, till it is determined by either party by a proper notice at the end of any year of the tenancy.[1] There is no other limit of time for such a lease and it may go on even for a century or more.[2] The lease is a single lease for the whole period till it is terminated. Although liable to be determined at the end of any year by a valid notice, it does not ipso facto come to an end at the end of every year.[3]

A periodic lease like a yearly tenancy is not determined by the death of the tenant. His legal representatives cannot be evicted from the land without a proper notice to quit.[4]

17. Lease from month to month.—A monthly tenancy is one single tenancy for an unstated period.[1a] A joint monthly lease is liable to partition among the co-lessees.[1] A monthly tenancy under this section is a heritable interest and is not determined by the death of the tenant.[2]

For a fuller discussion of the features of such leases, see section 105, Note 31.

18. Possession under invalid lease—Presumption under this section.—Where a lease for a term of years or in perpetuity is granted but is invalid and the lessee enters into possession under such a lease, a tenancy may arise by implication from the payment of rent by the tenant and its acceptance by the landlord. The presumption of a yearly or monthly tenancy under this section may apply to such leases.[1] The invalid lease would not constitute a "contract to the contrary" in such cases,[2] for two reasons: (1) The section contemplates a valid contract to the contrary. (See Note 15.) (2) The contract would not form part of the lease in question. (See Note 8.) But the invalid lease itself cannot be treated as a yearly or monthly tenancy under this section.[3] The reason is that the section cannot convert an invalid lease into a valid one.

See also section 105, Notes 8 and 19 and section 107, Note 8.

19. Notice to quit—General principles.—The section provides that in cases coming under it the lease can be determined by either the lessor or the lessee by notice. The principles laid down in English decisions as to what would be a valid notice to quit are, it has been authoritatively held, equally applicable to cases arising in India.[1] According to these principles, a notice to quit must be a clear and unambiguous intimation to the lessor or lessee, as the case may be, of the intention of the party giving the notice that the lease is to terminate at a certain time. No particular form is necessary but there must be no uncertainty or ambiguity in the notice on the above point.[2] But a notice need not be clear and unambiguous in its expressed terms. It is sufficient if the notice is such that it can be rendered clear and unambiguous by the application of the maxim id certum est quod certum reddi potest (that is certain which can be made certain).[3] Further, a notice to quit ought not to be construed with a view to find fault with it but with a view to its validity.[4] The validity of a notice to quit ought not to turn on the splitting of a straw.[5]

In Haribar Banerji v. Ramshashi Roy[6] their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down the following as the principles deducible from English authorities on the subject : Notice to quit, though not strictly accurate or consistent in the statements embodied in them, may still be good and effective in law. The test of their sufficient is not what they would mean to a stranger ignorant of all the facts and circumstances touching the holding to which they purport to refer, but what they would mean to tenants presumably conversant with all those facts and circumtsances. Further, notices to quit are to be construed not with a desire to find faults in them which would render them defective but to be construed ut res magis valeat, quam pereat (that an act may avail rather than perish).

But the above principles are only applicable to notices containing errors honestly but inadvertently made. The principles would be entirely inapplicable to inaccuracies deliberately inserted for fraudulent purposes.[6a]

Whether a particular notice is valid according to the above principles depends on the terms of the notice in each case and the facts and circumstances of that case. The undermentioned are illustrative cases.[7]

It will be noted in this connection that once a notice is given, the party giving it cannot himself retract it. The consent of the other side is necessary for waiver of notice : See S. 113. A notice is not bad merely because it refers to the possibility of such waiver. Such reference does not affect the finality of the notice.

A tenancy can be determined only as a whole or not at all. It cannot be determined piecemeal.[9] Hence, a notice to quit with reference to a portion of the holding is bad.[10]

It is open to the Court, notwithstanding certain features in a notice which may suggest that it is an attempt to terminate the tenancy partially, to hold, on the construction of the notice in the light of all the facts and circumstances of the case, that the notice is not of this kind and is valid.[11]

A notice is not invalid merely because the landlord treats the person to whom the notice is given as a trespasser and not as a tenant.[12]

Where a notice to quit is invalid or insufficient for any reason, it will not have the effect of determining the lease.[13] But where an invalid notice is accepted and acted upon by the party to whom it is given, the tenancy would be determined.[14] There would be an implied surrender in such a case. But where a lease is really determinable only by six months' notice under this section but the lessor gives only a month's notice, the mere fact that the lessee in his reply notice erroneously admits that he is a monthly tenant will not estop him from contending that the notice was insufficient. The reason is that the lessor is not in any way misled by such a statement.[15]

A notice to quit is necessary under this section before a suit for ejectment can be brought only where the defendant is a tenant of the plaintiff.[16] Nor will such a notice to quit give a cause of action for a suit for ejectment against a person where the relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties has been created not by a lease but by a decision of Court.[17]

See also Note 20.

20. Notice to quit with an option to continue on different terms.—A notice must be absolute and unconditional in its terms.[1] Otherwise, it would not amount to a clear and unambiguous intimation of an intention to terminate the lease on a certain date. Thus, a notice giving the lessee an option either to vacate the property by a certain date or to pay enhanced rent from such date will be bad.[2] On this principle, it has been held that a notice which merely informs the lessee that if he wants to keep the premises after a certain date, he will have to pay enhanced rent at a certain rate is bad.[3] The reason is that such a notice virtually amounts only to giving the lessee an option either to vacate the property by a certain date or to pay enhanced rent.

But, where a notice clearly expresses an intention to terminate a lease by a certain date, the mere fact that it is coupled with an intimation that if the lessee continued in possession after such date he would be liable for enhanced rent does not make the notice bad.[4] The reason is that such a clause in a notice to quit only amounts to an offer of a new tenancy on a higher rent and does not affect the intention to terminate the present lease on the given date. Sometimes, a notice which is expressed as giving an option to the lessee to vacate the property by a certain date or pay enhanced rent thereafter has been treated on construction as a definite notice to quit on such date coupled with an offer of a new tenancy at an enhanced rent from such date.[4a]

Where a notice to quit clearly conveys the intention to terminate the lease by a certain date, the mere fact that the notice provides for its abandonment in case the other party agrees to an enhancement or reduction of the rent, does not affect the validity of the notice.[5] The reason is that such a provision relates only to the waiver of the notice by mutual consent. The law allows waiver of a notice to quit by the person who has given the notice with the consent of the other party. (See S. 113.) A mere provision, in a notice, for such waiver by mutual agreement between the parties will not affect the validity of the notice. (See Note 19.)

A notice to quit is not bad, merely because it provides that if the tenant fails to vacate the property by the date fixed in the notice, he will be liable for damages at a certain rate.[6] In such a case there is merely an intimation to the tenant as to the consequences that would follow from his non-compliance with the notice to quit. The clearness of the requisition for quitting the property by a certain date is not affected.

21. Notice required under other sections for determining lease.—The requirements prescribed by this section with regard to a notice apply only to a notice given under this section for determining a lease. Such requirements do not apply to notices issued under other sections of the Act. For instance, a notice under S. 108, cl. (e) expressing the lessee's intention of avoiding a lease on account of the destruction of the property, which is the subject-matter of the lease, need not comply with the requirements prescribed by this section.[1] So also, the notice under S. 111, clause (g) given by the lessor of his transferee determining a lease on forfeiture being incurred need not comply with the requirements laid down in this section.[2] words, the determination of the lease by such notice must have become complete by the expiration of a valid notice to quit before the institution at the suit. Where this is not the case, the suit itself cannot be treated as a notice to quit. Nor can the Court, in such a case pass a decree for ejectment against the tenant fixing a certain time within which he must vacate the property.[2] The contrary view taken in the undermentioned cases[3] is, it is submitted, not correct.

But the above principle does not apply to a trespasser who can, therefore, be ejected without any previous notice.[4] (See also section 105, Note 37.)

Where a tenancy is established, the onus of proving, in a suit for ejectment, that the tenancy has been determined by a notice to quit or otherwise is on the plaintiff.[5] But it has been held in the undermentioned case[6] that, where it is proved that a notice to quit was served on the defendant the onus is on him to prove that it was invalid.

A plea as to the absence of a notice to quit is one which goes to the root of the plaintiff's case and as such can be raised even in second appeal for the first time.[7]

Also see S. 111 Note 23.

As already seen, it is a matter in regard to which the onus of proof is on the plaintiff. In fact, such a notice to quit is an essential part of the plaintiff's cause of action. But a plea as to the invalidity of a notice cannot be allowed to be raised for the first time in second appeal.[8] This, as already seen, is a matter in regard to which the onus of proof is on the tenant.

In a suit for ejectment against a tenant, the plea of want of notice may be taken as an alternative to a plea of permanent tenancy.[9]

Where, in defence to a suit for ejectment against a tenant after a notice to quit, the tenant sets up a permanent tenancy or any other tenancy, which is not determinable by notice by the lessor, the onus of proving such a tenancy is on the tenant. (See section 105, Note 43.)

Even after a lease has been determined, a lessee cannot be ejected by the lessor by force. The lessee can only be evicted in due course of law.[10] (See also section 105, Note 37.)

25. Denial of lessor's title by lessee and notice to quit.—Under S. 111, clause (g) a denial of the lessor's title by the lessee will make the lease liable to forfeiture at the option of the lessor. In other words, the denial will not ipso facto determine the lease. It is such denial coupled with the exercise of option by the lessor in the prescribed manner that will cause the determination of the lease. This principle applies also to a tenancy from month to month or from year to year under this section.

But in the case of a lease from year to year the disclaimer of title by the lessee will, according to the English law, made the lessee liable to ejectment without notice on another principle. This principle has been expressed as follows :[1]

> "The holding being from year to year subject to the mutual will of landlord and tenant to determine it on giving the usual six months' notice, evidence of a disclaimer is evidence of an election to put an end to the tenancy and supersede the necessity for such a notice. Hence verbal or written denials of a tenancy have rendered notice to quit unnecessary, but it does not appear that they have effected a forfeiture of the term."

The above principle has also been followed in a series of decisions in India,[2] although there are also some decisions, which do not refer to this distinction between a lease from year to year and other leases.[3]

There is a conflict of decisions whether the denial of title by the defendant in the suit for ejectment itself will be sufficient for the purpose of obviating the necessity of a notice to quit on the above principle.[4] There is also a conflict of decisions as to whether the assertion of a permanent tenancy by a tenant who is not entitled to such a right will amount to a denial of title for the above purpose.[5]

Under S. III (g) as amended by Act XX of, 1929 the option of the lessor to forfeit a lease is to be exercised by issuing a written notice to the lessee. This notice need not comply with the provisions of this section.

26. Other modes of determination of lease.—A notice to quit is not the only mode of determining a lease even in cases such as those under this section, in which a notice to quit would be sufficient for the purpose. (See section III.) Where a lease has been determined according to the law without any notice to quit, such a notice is not necessary before a suit for ejectment against the tenant.[1] The reason is that after a lease has been determined in some manner recognised by the law, the tenant or his representative in interest would be merely in the position of a trespasser and can be ejected from the property without any previous notice to quit. (See S. 105, Note 37 and S. 116, Note 13.)

Similarly, where a lease is voidable under the law and has been avoided according to the law, the position is the same as if the lease has been lawfully determined and the quondam lessee can be ejected without any previous notice to quit.[2]

But a lease cannot be determined except in some way recognised by the law. Thus, a lease of joint land is not ipso facto determined by partition among the co-owners and the allotment of the leased land to one of them, so as to dispense with the necessity of a notice to quit before a suit for ejectment by him against the tenant.[3] Where the monthly tenant of a house is obliged to vacate the house under an order from the Plague Authority acting under statutory powers, the tenant is not thereby absolved from liability to give the usual notice to quit, if he desires to put an end to the tenancy.[4]

27. Effect of giving notice where it is not necessary.—Where a notice to quit is given by the landlord although such notice is not necessary for evicting a person from certain immovable property, no tenancy is created merely by reason of such notice.[1]

28. Notice by lessor undertaking to pay compensation for improvements —Effect.—It has been held that where a lessor in his notice to quit has undertaken to pay compensation to the tenant for the improvements effected by him before compelling him to vacate the property the lessor cannot enforce his right to possession, unless he has paid or tendered such compensation, although there may be no provision for it in the lease.[1]

29. Determination of main lease by notice—Effect on sub-lease.—The determination of a lease by a valid notice by the lessor will automatically put an end to any sub-lease granted by the lessee.[1]

30. Resumption of possession by landlord without giving notice—Effect. —Where a tenure was resumable by the grantor thereof after notice but the latter took possession of the land without giving notice and the grantee acquiesced in such resumption and did not raise any objection on the ground of want of notice, it was held that he could not afterwards contend that the resumption was unlawful for want of notice.[1] It is conceived that in such cases the principle of implied surrender will apply. (See S. 111, Note 10.)

31. Lessee giving up possession before termination of lease—Liability for damages or rent.—Where a tenant gives notice determining a lease but such notice is invalid the lease will continue in force notwithstanding such notice. If, however, the tenant gives up possession and the landlord re-enters on the premises, there will be an implied surrender of the lease. (See S. 111, Note 10.) The lessee will not be liable for rent after such surrender. But he will be liable for damages for premature determination of the lease in breach of the contract of tenancy.[1]

Although a lessee may actually vacate the property before the expiry of the notice given by him to terminate the lease, he will be liable for rent till the last day of the notice.[2]

Where the lessee of a house under a monthly tenancy is obliged to vacate the house under the orders of the Plague Authority, he is not thereby absolved from the duty of giving notice to quit for the usual period if he wishes to terminate the lease, or from the liability to pay rent till the lease is so determined.[3]

32. Lessee holding over after expiry of notice to quit—Effect.—Where a lessee continues to be in possession of the property after the lease has been determined by a valid notice, he will not be liable for rent.[1] The reason is that in such a case, there will not be any relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties after the expiry of the notice. He will not also be liable for damages for use and occupation. (See section 105, Note 70.) But the lessee will be liable for mesne profits. He will also be liable for damages for breach of the duty under S. 108, clause (q) of putting the lessor into possession of the property. The amount awardable as damages is within the discretion of the Court to be exercised according to the circumstances of the case.[2] But, where the notice to quit is invalid, it will not have the effect of determining the lease and the lessee will be liable for rent even after the expiry of the notice.

Where a notice to quit given by a lessor to the lessee is coupled with a demand of rent at a higher rate if the lessee should continue in possession after the date fixed in the notice, the question arises whether and in what cases the lessee will be liable for rent at the enhanced rate if he continues in possession. Such cases may be broadly divided into two classes :

(1) Those in which the notice to quit is valid and terminates the tenancy on the date mentioned therein.

(2) Those in which the notice is not valid.

In the first class, the demand of rent at higher rate is virtually an offer of a fresh tenancy on new terms. In such cases, the question will be whether the tenant has accepted the offer of such new tenancy. If he has done so, he will be liable for the enhanced rent. But, if he has not accepted the offer, he will not be liable for the enhanced rent.[3] But he will be liable for mesne profits and damages on the principles mentioned above.[4]

Does the continuation in possession after the date fixed in the notice to quit amount by itself, to an acceptance by the tenant of the offer of a new tenancy on different terms in such cases ? There is a conflict of decisions on this question. One view is that a new tenancy is not created ipso facto by the continuation of the tenant in possession in such cases.[5] The opposite view has been taken in the undermentioned cases.[6]

In the second class, the lease will continue to be in force even after the date fixed in the notice and there will be no question of the offer of any fresh tenancy on new terms. In such cases the question will be whether there is a valid contract for the variation of rent. According to the Oudh Chief Court[7] even if the notice to quit is invalid, the continuance in possession of the tenant after the date fixed in the lease without protesting against the proposal to enhance rent will amount to a binding agreement to pay such enhanced rent. This view is not accepted by the Patna and Nagpur High Courts.[8] It is submitted that the Oudh view is not correct.

33. Notice to quit—Who can give.—Under this section a lease can be determined by a notice to quit either by the lessor or the lessee. The expression "lessor" will include any person who would be entitled to the possession of the property on the termination of the lease.[1] (See also Note 35.) Similarly, the term "lessee" will include any person in whom the leasehold interest is vested for the time being.

34. Who can give notice to quit—Co-lessors.—In the case of co-lessors, who are joint tenants, the rule under the English law is that any one of them can put an end to the tenancy by giving a notice to quit.[1] This principle was also applied in the undermentioned decision in India.[2] The English view is based on the theory that a tenant holds the premises only so long as he and the cosharer landlords all agree.[3] But according to the general view in India, a lease cannot be determined by notice by one or some of the co-lessors alone. This view is based on the theory that the relationship created by contract with several joint landlords continues, until there exists a new and complete volition to change it.[4] One co-lessor cannot give a notice to quit even as to his own share in the property.[5] On the above principles, even where a tenant has incurred the liability to have his lease forfeited under S. 111, the lease cannot be determined, except where all the co-lessors concur in doing so.[6]

But, where one cosharer landlord has been acting as manager on behalf of all the cosharers, he can give a valid notice to quit on behalf of all.[7] This is on the principle of agency. (See Note 38.) Similarly, in the case of a lease of property belonging to a Hindu joint family a notice to quit by the manager of the family is enough.[8]

Where the tenant has dealt with one co-owner as the sole owner and sole landlord and by so doing is estopped from denying his title, such co-owner can give him notice to quit and sue him in ejectment.[9]

Where a person in co-owner with others with regard to one property and a sole owner of another property and both properties are separately let to the same tenant, such co-owner can give a notice to quit with regard to the separate property.[10]

The principle that the concurrence of all cosharers is necessary for a suit for ejectment by determining a tenancy does not apply to a suit for ejectment against a trespasser.[11] Similarly, suit for ejectment can be brought against a tenant by sufferance (i. e., a tenant who holds over after the determination of his tenancy without the assent of the landlord) by one of the cosharer landlords alone.[12] The reason is that such a tenant is no better than a trespasser in the eye of the law. (See S. 105, Note 37.)

Where a notice to quit is given by all the cosharer landlords, the tenancy will be determined on the expiration of the notice. Hence, after such expiration the tenant will be only a tenant by sufferance and a suit for ejectment can be brought against him by one or some of the cosharers alone.[13]

It has been held that, except where there is a special provision of law to the contrary, one co-owner cannot sue in respect of the common property in his own name on behalf of all.[14]

One cosharer landlord cannot sue for his own share of the rent, unless there is an agreement for the payment of rent separately to such landlord.[15] One cosharer alone cannot enhance the rent of the holding or sue for enhancement of such rent,[16] except where the rent has been paid separately to the cosharer landlord.[17]

Joint Receivers.

A notice to quit given by one of two joint Receivers is not valid. The reason is that the object of the Court in appointing two joint Receivers is that the estate may have the benefit of the opinion of both as regards its management. Hence, one of the Receivers cannot delegate his duties to the other.[18]

Co-trustees of religious or charitable endowment.

A notice to quit by one only of two Urlans of a Malabar Devaswom is invalid.[19]

35. Who can give notice to quit—Assignment by lessor.—As seen in Note 33, the term "lessor" in this section includes any person who would be entitled to the possession of the property on the termination of the lease. Hence a subsequent lessee of the property for a term of years can give a notice to quit under this section.[1] (See S. 109.) A notice to quit must be given by all persons who have acquired an interest in the reversion.[2]

Where the lessor has assigned his interest in the property to another, the latter can give notice to quit, even though a notice of the assignment has not been given to the lessee.[3] Where the lessor gives notice to quit and then assigns his interest to another the assignee can take advantage of the notice.[3a] After the landlord has assigned the reversion to another, he cannot issue a notice to quit under this section.[4] But, where under the terms of the assignment the landlord has undertaken to recover possession from the tenant and hand over the property to the transferee, a notice to quit by the assignor even after the assignment will be valid and effective.[5] The reason is that in such a case the right to the reversion must be deemed to be vested in the assignor for the limited purpose of recovering possession from the tenant. Where a person entered into a contract to purchase the lessor's interest but before the purchase was completed gave notice to quit to the tenant who acting upon the notice vacated the premises, it was held that the purchaser was estopped from disputing the validity of the notice on the ground that he had no power to determine the tenancy on the date when the notice to quit was given.[6]

36. Who can give notice—Miscellaneous.—A Receiver appointed by the Court can, if so authorised by the order of appointment, issue a notice to quit against a tenant of the property of which he has been appointed Receiver.[1] As to the power of joint Receivers, see Note 34.

A cestui que trust cannot give a notice to quit in regard to trust property. It is only the trustee or his agent that can do so. A cestui que trust is not the agent of the trustee.[2]

The trustee of a religious society can give notice to quit to a tenant of property belonging to the society.[3] As to the power of joint trustees, see Note 34.

37. Notice to quit—To whom to be given.—Where a notice to quit is given by the lessor, it is to be given to the lessee or to the person in whom the leasehold interest may be vested. Where the notice is given by the lessee, it is to be given to the lessor or to any other person who may be entitled to the immediate reversion in the demised property.

Co-lessees.

Where the leasehold interest is not vested in a single person but in joint tenants the notice to quit must be given to all the joint tenants.[1] But proof of service of such notice on one joint tenant will be prima facie evidence of such notice having reached all the joint tenants.[2] But this presumption will only arise where a notice to quit has been prepared, addressed and sent to all the joint tenants. Where no notice was addressed to one of the joint tenants at all, the presumption cannot arise. In such a case the mere service of notice on the other joint tenants will not be sufficient to determine the lease.[3]

Where the joint tenants constitute members of a joint Hindu family living together in the same house, the service on one of them, at their residence, of a notice addressed to all of them is enough.[4] In such a case, it is not necessary that separate copies of the notice must be served.[5]

Where a lease has been granted to one member of a joint Hindu family, the lease can be determined by a notice to quit issued to such member alone and it is not necessary to serve a notice on all the members of the family.[6]

Lessee's heirs.

Where a lessee dies leaving a number of heirs, all the heirs must be served with a notice to quit if the lease is to be determined.[7] Where there are several co-lessees, one of whom dies, a notice to quit to the survivors alone is not enough. A notice to quit must be served on the heirs of the deceased also. Otherwise the notice will not be sufficient to determine the lease.[8]

Where a sole tenant dies leaving several heirs separate notices to quit served on all of them are enough to determine the lease. It is not necessary that there must be a single notice to all of them.[9]

Lessee's assignee.

The assignee of a lease is entitled to a notice under this section.[10] But a sub-lessee is not entitled to any notice before he can be ejected by the superior lessor. The reason is that there is no privity between the two.[11] For the same reason as long as the original lease continues the lessor cannot determine the sub-lease by giving a notice to quit to the sub-lessee.[12] An assignee of a lease, on the other hand, stands in the shoes of the assignor, i.e., the original lessee and there is privity between such assignee and the lessor. Where a tenancy is purchased by one person benami in the name of another, a notice to the real purchaser is enough to determine the lease. A notice to the benamidar is not necessary.[13]

38. Notice to or by agent.—This section is subject to the general law of agency. Hence a notice to quit can be given by[1] or to[1a] a duly authorised agent so as to bind the principal. It is conceived, however, that when a notice is given by some person other than the lessor or lessee himself, the circumstances must show that the party to whom the notice is given knows that the person giving the notice is the agent of the other party. Otherwise, the notice will lack the essential quality of a notice to quit, namely, the quality of informing the person, to whom the notice is given, that the other party to the lease intends to terminate the lease by a certain date. But it has been held in England that where a notice is given by a general agent, his authority need not appear on the face of the notice.[2] This is perhaps because in such a case the party served with notice may be presumed to have notice of the authority of the person who actually gives the notice. A receiver is an office of the camp and as such cannot serve a notice to quit on the lessee. Where, however, he is sues the notice with the consent of the lessor he acts as the agent of the lessor and hence in such a case the notice is valid.[2a]

Where an unauthorised person gives a notice to quit on behalf of another, the notice will be invalid. It cannot be ratified by the person on whose behalf it purports to be given.[3] This is expressly provided for under the Contract Act : see S. 200 of that Act and illustration (b) to that section.

An authority to give a notice to quit need not be in writing.[4] The authority to sue in ejectment includes an authority to give a notice to quit.[5]

The provision in the second paragraph of the section that a notice to quit must be signed by or on behalf of the person giving the notice only refers to the signature to the notice. The provision does not refer to the giving of the notice, i. e., the decision to give the notice. The agent's authority under the general law relates to the decision to give notice.

As regards the authority of an agent to receive a notice, the section proivdes that a notice must be sent by post or served personally on the party to be bound by the notice. If the notice is to be served on any other person so as to bind the person for whom the notice is meant, the service must be on one of his family or servants at his residence. This provision does not mean that a notice cannot be directed to an agent of the other party to the lease who does not reside with him. The provision only means that in serving a notice on the agent or the principal, the procedure laid down in the section must be followed.

Under the general law, a notice served on an agent who is duly authorised to receive it will bind the principal, although such notice may not actually reach or be brought to the knowledge of the principal.[6] Under S. 229 of the Contract Act, a notice given to an agent in the course of the business transacted by him for the principal shall, as between the principal and third parties, have the same legal consequence as if it had been given to the principal. This provision applies also to notices to quit.[7]

As regards the authority to take delivery of a notice quit sent by post or to sign the postal acknowledgment form for such notice sent by registered post, see Note 45.

39. Period of notice.—This section requires a notice of six months in the case of a yearly tenancy and a notice of fifteen days in the case of a monthly tenancy. The parties to a lease may provide for a shorter or longer notice than this by special contract, in which case, the provisions of this section will not apply. But in any case, if the period of the notice is shorter than that prescribed (by this section or contract, as the case may be) such notice will not be sufficient to terminate the lease.[1] But the notice may be for a longer period than required.[2]

Where a notice falls short of the requisite period, the mere fact that the tenant is actually allowed to hold the property for the full length of the period for which notice ought to have been given and a suit for ejectment against him is brought only afterwards, will not cure the defect in the notice so as to make it effectual for the purpose of terminating the tenancy.[3] But where the party to whom a notice is given accepts it and acts upon it, the fact that it is not of the requisite length will not matter.[4] In such a case, the lease will be terminated on the principle of surrender. (See section 111.)

To terminate a tenancy under this section the notice must be of fifteen clear days or six clear months according as the tenancy may be a monthly or a yearly one.[5]

This means that the period from the service of the notice to the time when the lease is expressed therein as terminated must not be less than fifteen days or six months as the case may be. This would require the exclusion of the day on which the notice is served but not of the day on which the tenancy is purported to be terminated.[6] The reason is that the tenant would be entitled under the notice to hold on till the midnight of such day.

Where a notice for six months in the case of a yearly tenancy and a notice of fifteen days in the case of a monthly tenancy is given it will not be bad simply because it does not appear on the face to be a six month's or fifteen day's notice as the case may be.[7]

Where a notice is prescribed by the contract of lease itself and consequently this section does not apply but the contract does not specify the length of the notice, it has been held that the period for which notice is to be given must be determined according to the principles of English law and that at lease a notice of six months must be given in the case of a tenancy from year to year.[8]

40. Expiring with end of year or month of tenancy.—A notice under this section must expire with the end of a year or month of the tenancy as the case may be. This means that the time at which the notice says that the tenancy is to terminate must coincide with the time at which a year or month of the tenancy (as the case may be) expires. Thus, where under a monthly tenancy the usual calendar month according to the British calendar is intended to be the month of the tenancy, a notice under this section must be for terminating the tenancy at the end of a calendar month. A notice which does not expire with the end of a year or month of the tenancy (as the case may be) will be invalid under this section.[1] Thus, a notice terminating the tenancy before the end of the current year or month of the tenancy, in which such notice is given, will be bad.[2]

Where a notice to quit under this section does not expire with the end of a month or year of the tenancy as required by this section, the mere fact that the notice is for a longer period than is required under this section[3] or that it expires after the end of the current year or month of the tenancy will not validate the notice. Similarly, where a notice under this section does not expire with the end of a year or month of the tenancy, the mere fact that the tenant is allowed to hold on till the end of such a period and the suit for ejectment is brought against him only afterwards cannot cure the defect in the notice so as to make it effective for the purpose of terminating the tenancy.[4]

The question whether a notice to quit expires with the end of a year or month of the tenancy is one of construction of the notice in each case. In construing a notice for this purpose, the principles mentioned in Note 19 must be remembered. Under those principles the validity of a notice must not be made to depend on the "splitting of a straw" as it is put. If a notice, on a fair and rational construction, clearly expresses the intention to terminate the lease at the end of a year or month of the tenancy, it must not be held to be invalid merely because on a hypercritical examination of it there may be some reason for saying that it is not accurate.

On this principle, it is immaterial whether a notice is to quit on the last day of a month or year of the tenancy[5] or on the next day after that.[6]

Similarly, a notice requiring a yearly tenant to vacate before the expiry of the last day of the year is good, as there is no appreciable interval between the expiry of the notice and the end of a year of the tenancy.[7]

A notice to quit by the last day of a year or month of the tenancy is valid.[8] Such a notice intends to keep the lease in force till the midnight of the day mentioned.

Under the English law also, a periodic tenancy, such as those referred to under this section, can only be terminated by a notice expiring with the end of a current period of the tenancy and not at any other time.[9]

It must be noted that a notice may be valid under this section, although the period of notice is longer than is required under this section. (See Note 39.) Hence, where a notice expires with the end of a year or month of the tenancy, it is not invalidated by the fact that the period between the service of the notice and the end of such month or year exceeds fifteen days or six months. In other words, the provision in the section that a tenancy mentioned therein is terminable by a notice of fifteen days or six months expiring with the end of a month or year of the tenancy does not mean that exactly a period of fifteen days or six months (and not a day more) must elapse between the service of the notice and the end of a month or year of the tenancy. It only means that the notice must be for terminating the tenancy at the end of such a month or year and not at any other time, and that the notice must be served at least fifteen days or six months before the end of such period. Thus, suppose in the case of a tenancy from month to month, a month of tenancy is the usual calendar month according to the British calendar. Suppose, in such a case a notice is given on the 5th of a month terminating the tenancy at the end of the month. The notice will not be invalid merely because the notice is given more than fifteen days before the end of the month.

41. Year or month of tenancy.—A year or month of the tenancy at the end of which a notice under this section is required to expire is not the calendar year or month in which the notice is given. The year or month referred to is the year or month calculated with reference to the commencement of the tenancy.[1]

It has been held that S. 110 does not apply to periodic leases and thereafter where a month to month tenancy is expressed to commence on a certain day that day need not be excluded in computing the period of the month of the tenancy.[2] (See also S. 110, Note 1.) Where it is uncertain from what day of the month, a tenancy from month to month began, it may be presumed that it began from the 1st day of a calendar month.[3]

Though in the case of a monthly tenancy the lease-deed may be executed and the tenant may enter into possession in the middle of a calendar month, the parties may agree that the period of the tenancy should only run from the beginning of such month, i.e., from the 1st day of the month. In such cases, a month of the tenancy would coincide with the calendar month. Such an agreement may be express or implied. It may be implied from the date fixed for the payment of rent.[4]

Where a lease expires and the tenancy is renewed under S. 116 from year to year or month to month in favour of the tenant, who holds over after such expiry, the renewed tenancy will run from the termination of the original lease. Where the original lease was for a definite term of a year or years, the lease would under S. 110, last during the whole of the anniversary of the day from which it commenced. Hence, in such cases, the tenancy by holding over will commence from the next day after such anniversary, and a month of the tenancy must be determined with reference to such commencement.[5] Thus, for instance, if a lease for four years commenced from 1st June 1921, the lease would last through the whole of 1st June 1925. If the tenant held over and the tenancy was renewed from month to month under S. 116, such tenancy must be held to have commenced on the 2nd June 1925. Hence, a month of the tenancy would, in the case, be the period from the 2nd day of any calendar month during the currency of the lease, to the 1st day of the next calendar month, both days being included. In other words, so long as the lease has not been determined, the 1st day of every calendar month would be the last day of a month of the tenancy. Hence, a notice to quit on the 1st of any calendar month would be a notice expiring with the end of a month of the tenancy.

In some decisions,[6] however, the tenancy by holding over in such cases is treated as commencing on the anniversary of the day on which the original lease for a term had commenced. It is submitted that such decisions overlook the provisions of S. 110 and are not correct law in view of the express decision of the Privy Council in Benoy Krishna v. Salsiccioni.[7]

42. Calendar for calculation of time.—The terms "month" and "year" have been defined in the General Clauses Act of 1897, S. 3, clauses (33) and (59) respectively as being reckonable according to the British calendar. These definitions are made applicable to this Act by S. 4 of the General Clauses Act. Hence, the expressions year to year, month to month, six months' notice, year of tenancy, and month of tenancy, occurring in this section must be understood and interpreted according to the British calendar. But this rule will not apply where there is a contract to the contrary. Such contract may be express or implied. Thus, there may be an implied contract that a year to year lease must be reckoned according to the Bengali calendar and not according to the British calendar. In such a case, a notice of six months expiring with a year of the tenancy calculated according to the Bengali calendar will be sufficient to terminate the tenancy.[1] The same principle will apply to a tenancy from month to month mutatis mutandis.[2]

It has been held that the expression "month" used in a business or legal document means a calendar month.[3]

43. Form of notice.—The general principle is that where there is no statutory provision for the determination of a tenancy by a written notice, a notice to quit may be oral.[1] But this section expressly requires a notice to quit to be in writing. The section permits such a notice to be signed either by the person who gives it or on his behalf by some other person. This means that a notice this section may be signed by a party personally or by his authorised agent.[2]

A notice to quit implies that it is addressed to the person to whom the notice is given. Where this is not the case, there would be no valid notice under this section. Thus, the mere institution by the lessor of proceedings for the possession of the leased property under S. 145 of the Criminal Procedure Code will not be a notice to quit.[3] Similarly, a mere resolution passed by a Municipal Council deciding to determine a lease granted by the municipality will not, in itself amount to a notice to quit under this section.[4]

44. Mode of service.—A notice under this section must be served in one or other of the four modes prescribed by the section. These are :

(1) by post ;

(2) by delivery or tender to the addressee personally ;

(3) by delivery or tender to one of his family or servants at his residence; and

(4) by affixing the notice to a conspicuous part of the demised property.

Out of the methods p to 4, the last is to be resorted to only when 2 and 3 are not practicable.[1] The sender of the notice is free to adopt any of the other three modes of service as he may think fit.[2] For instance, he can get the notice served by delivery or tender to a member of the addressee's family or to one of his servants at his residence though service of the notice personally on the addressee is not impracticable.[3] Similarly, a notice may always be sent by post although the other modes of service prescribed by the section are not impracticable.

But when a notice is not sent by post, the delivery or tender of the notice must be made to the addressee personally except when such delivery or tender is made at his residence, in which case it may be made to one of his family or servants.[3a] It follows from the above that personal service on the addressee can be effected at any place. But vicarious service can only be at his residence.[4]

Where a notice is desired to be served at the residence of the addressee it must be delivered or tendered to him or to one of his family or servants. In the absence of such delivery or tender, merely beating a drum and affixing the notice to the wall of the house wherein the addressee resides will not be enough.[5]

The tender and refusal of a notice is as good as delivery of the notice for the purpose of this section. This principle applies also to cases where the refusal is not by the addressee himself but by one of his family or servants at his residence.[6]

It is conceived that where a notice is delivered or tendered at the residence of addressee, to one of his family or servants, the service would be effective although the notice has not actually reached the addressee.

The advertisement of a notice in a newspaper will not be a valid mode of service under this section.[7]

As to whether sending a notice to a party's pleader or solicitor will be enough, see Note 46. As to the presumption arising from service of notice on one of the joint tenants, see Note 37.

It has been held in England (where there are statutory provisions prohibiting certain acts being done on Sundays that a notice to quit) by a tenant is good though given on a sunday 8.

45. Service by post.—The section as amended by Act XX of 1929 expressly recognises service by post as valid mode of service of a notice under this section. As the Special Committee point out in their Report the amendment only gives express legislative effect to what was already regarded as the law on the subject both in India and in England.[1] The principle of the matter is this. If a letter properly directed, containing a notice to quit, is proved to have been put into the post office, it is presumed that the letter reached its destination at the proper time according to the regular course of business of the post office, and was received by the person to whom it was addressed. That presumption would apply with still greater force to letters which the sender has taken the precaution to register and is not rebutted by the fact that a receipt for the letter is produced signed on behalf of the addressee by some person other than the addressee himself.[2]

In this connection, reference may also be made to the following statutory provisions :

(1) Under section 16 of the Evidence Act, when there is a question whether a particular act was done, the existence of any course of business, according to which it naturally would have been done, is a relevant fact. Illustration (b) to the section is as follows : "The question is, whether a particular letter reached A. The facts that it was posted in due course, and was not returned through the Dead Letter Office are relevant."

(2) Under S. 114 of the Evidence Act, illustration (f), the Court may presume that the common course of business has been followed in particular cases. Under this principle, where it is shown that a letter was properly directed and posted, the Court may presume that it duly reached the addressee. But the presumption under S. 114 is only one of fact[3] and the Court may decline to draw such presumption in the circumstances of a given case. For instance, if it is shown that the usual course of the post was interrupted by disturbances, the Court may refuse to presume that the letter reached the addressee.

(3) Under S. 27 of the General Clauses Act of 1897, where any Act of the Central Legislature requires or authorises any document to be served or sent by post, unless a different intention appears, the service shall be deemed to be effected by properly addressing, pre-paying and posting by registered post, a letter containing the document. and unless the contrary is proved, to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post.

It must be emphasised that the presumption of due service arising on general principles and from the above provisions of law, applies only in cases in which it is shown that the notice was properly addressed.[4] The express provision under the amended section that the notice may be sent by post only contemplates the sending by post to the correct address.[5]

Suppose, a notice is sent by registered post but is returned as having been refused by the addressee. This will be sufficient service of the notice for the purpose of this section,[6] as a valid tender and refusal of a notice have the same effect as a delivery thereof. But there is a conflict of decisions as to whether the production in Court of the cover, in which the notice was sent, with the endorsement of the postal official to the effect that it was refused by the addressee, would be sufficient to prove tender and refusal by the addressee. The general view is that the production of such cover will be enough for the purpose.[7] But the contrary view has been taken in the decision noted below.[8]

In the undermentioned case,[9] the Bombay High Court held that where a notice sent by post is tendered to the addressee but refused by him and returned unopened to the sender, it cannot, be held to be validly served. The reason given was that one cannot assume that, because an addressee declines to accept a particular envelop, he has guessed correctly its contents. The view is against the general consensus of opinion in the matter.

Although the amendment of 1929 only gives express legislative effect to an already accepted principle, one thing must be noted. Before the amendment the provision in the section that the notice must be delivered or tendered was also applicable to addressee or to one of his family or servants at his residence was also applicable to service through the post office.[10] Under the amended section, the above provision will not apply to service of notice by post.[11] Thus, before the amendment, if a notice sent by post was delivered to a servant of the addressee at his place of business (not being the addressee's residence) the service would not have been sufficient.[12] But such delivery would be sufficient under the amended section.

At the same time, it must be noted that mere despatch of a notice by post would not be sufficient even under the amended section. Thus, if it is shown that a notice sent by post has not reached the addressee, there would be no effective service under this section, unless it is proved that the notice was delivered or tendered to one of his family or servants at his residence by the postman. On the question whether the notice has reached the addressee or not, the Court is entitled to draw upon the usual presumptions which the law allows as to communications sent by post. The section does not create any new presumption in regard to this matter. So, if a question arises whether a notice sent by post has reached the addressee or was tendered to him, the considerations that would govern the determination of the question would be the same after the amendment as before. The remarks of the Allahabad High Court in the undermentioned decision[13] which imply the contrary are, it is submitted, not correct.

From the above discussion, it will be clear that where a notice is delivered to some person other than the addressee himself the question whether it has been sent by post or otherwise is material in two ways :

(1) If the notice is sent by post the question where it is delivered is not material so long as it reaches the addressee in time. But if the notice is not sent by post and it is delivered to some person other than the addressee himself the service will not be valid unless, inter alia, the delivery is made at the residence of the addressee.

(2) Where a notice sent by post is delivered to some person other than the addressee himself, the service will not ordinarily be valid if the notice has not actually reached the addressee unless the person to whom it was delivered was duly authorised by the addressee to receive such notice. But where a notice is delivered or tendered at the residence of the addressee to a member of his family or to one of his servants, the service will be effective and valid although the notice does not actually reach the addressee. This rule will also apply to notices sent by post.

46. Service of notice on party's pleader or solicitor.—The service of a notice to quit on a party's pleader or solicitor will not be valid under this section, unless such pleader or solicitor is authorised as an agent to receive such notices on his behalf.

But in the undermentioned cases[1] the view was expressed that, if a notice is sent to party's pleader or solicitor and is sent by such pleader or solicitor to the party, this would be tantamount to a personal service on the party, though it is an indirect mode of service. It is submitted with respect that this view is not correct.

In the above circumstances, unless the pleader or solicitor is authorised to receive the notice on his client's behalf the service will not be valid, merely because the lawyer forwards the notice to the client and the notice reaches the client's hands eventually.

As regards the question of treating the notice as being served on the client personally, no doubt, the section does not require that the giver of the notice must serve the notice himself personally. But it is certainly contemplated that the person who delivers the notice must be the giver of the notice himself or his agent. Thus, if A wishes to give a notice to quit to B but hands over the notice to C who is not A's agent, the mere fact that C delivers it to B is not tantamount to a "delivery" of the notice to B within the meaning of the section. Hence, in such a case unless C is a member of the family of B or is his servant and the notice is delivered to C at B's residence, the service will not be effective under this section. Hence, the fact that a notice to quit eventually finds its way into the hands of a party after being first delivered to his lawyer will not amount to a service of the notice personally on the party himself as contemplated by this section.

47. Leases by Government.—This section does not apply to leases of land by the Government, as the Crown Grants Act expressly excludes from the operation of this Act transfers of land and interests therein by or on behalf of the Crown. (See S. 105, Note 1.) But the English common law rule has been applied to such cases as a principle of justice, equity and good conscience. It has accordingly been held that a lease by the Government for building purposes fixing no term must be presumed to be a yearly tenancy determinable by six months' notice expiring with a year of the tenancy.[1]

A notice to quit given on behalf of the Government need not be signed by the Secretary of State for India himself. A notice signed by the Collector will be enough.[2]

48. Lease by municipality.—A municipality is not outside the purview of this section. A lease by a municipality will, therefore, be subject to the provisions of this section. Such a lease cannot, therefore. in the absence of a contract the contrary, be determined by a mere resolution passed by the Municipal Council and without any notice being served on the lessee in accordance with the provisions of this section.[1]

49. Notice in cases not governed by this section.—This section embodies a principle of general applicability. Hence even in cases in which a lease is not governed by this section, it will be regarded, in the absence of a contract, local law or usage to the contrary, as determinable by a sufficient notice given by either party to the other.[1] The lease will not be determinable without such notice.[2]

The requirements of this section as to the validity of a notice will not apply to such cases.[2a] The question of the sufficiency of notice in such cases will have to be determined according to the principles of justice, equity and good conscience. It will have to be seen in each case whether the notice given is a reasonable one with regard both to the length of such notice and the time at which it is to expire.[3] The question must expire with a year of the tenancy.[8] But generally a notice of six months is considered reasonable in such cases.[9] This period of six months is to be calculated according to the calendar which the people generally follow in the particular locality. Thus, in regard to tenancies in the mofussil of Bengal, the six months' period must generally be calculated according to the Bengali calendar.[10] Further a notice purporting to terminate an agricultural tenancy should either ask for possession at the end of the agricultural year or at least when the crop of the year has been harvested.[10a]

A notice will not be reasonable if it requires the tenant to quit the property immediately and does not fix any time for doing so.[11] It is conceived that in such cases, the alleged notice will not be a notice at all to quit but simply a demand for possession.

The undermentioned are illustrative cases as to what will be a reasonable notice[12] and what will not be such notice.[13]

A verbal notice is quite sufficient to determine a tenancy,[14] unless there is any express provision requiring a written notice. See also the undermentioned case.[15]

1. Scope of the section.—The section prescribes the formalities that must be adopted in order to effect a valid lease under this Act. A lease from year to year or for a term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent can be made only by a registered instrument. A lease for a term of one year or less than a year can be made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.

The proviso to the section empowers the Provincial Government to dispense with the formality of registration or of delivery of possession prescribed for effecting leases coming within the second paragraph of the section.[1]

The registration of a document under this section is made dependent not upon the value of the property as in S. 54 or upon the amount of rent but upon the 'period' of the lease. Thus, a document creating a lease for a term exceeding one year will require registration even though the value of the property or the amount of rent is very small: and a lease for a term of one year or less will not require even a written instrument even though the value of the property or the amount of rent may be very large.

Before the passing of this Act there was no provision requiring leases to be made in writing and all leases could be made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.[2] But if they were made in writing the document was required to be registered under the Registration Act if the lease was for a term exceeding one year or from year to year or reserving a yearly rent.[3] Now the documents creating such leases will be registrable both under this Act as well as the Registration Act.[4] Where a lease for a term of one year or less is made in writing, the document creating such lease is not required to be registered under the Registration Act.[5] Before the year 1904, a valid lease for one year or less could be created under this Act, by an unregistered instrument.[6] The second paragraph of the section was substituted in 1904 for the old paragraph and since then such a lease cannot be created merely by an unregistered instrument.[7]

The amendments made by Act XX of 1929 make it clear that the section is exhaustive as regards the modes of creating a tenancy and hence, where the Act applies, no lease can be created except in one of the manners specified by this section.[8]

2. Law in the Punjab. — This Act does not apply to the Punjab. But by a notification No. 183-st, issued by the Punjab Government on 27th April 1935 under S. 1 of this Act, the present S. 107 has been made applicable to all the municipal areas in that province. The result is that in all the 'non-municipal areas,' whether before or after the above notification, in the Punjab a lease for any term can be effected by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession[1] though, if made in writing it may require registration under the Registration Act, 1908, that Act being applicable there.[2] In all the 'municipal areas' after 1935 a lease can be effected only in the manner prescribed by this section.[3]

3. Term of a lease. — The term of a lease is to be determined from the document of lease, where there is one, construed in the light of surrounding circumstances.[1] Where no period is specifically fixed, but there are words in the deed indicating the period in general, the period of lease for the purpose of registration must be understood to mean that period during which the lessee is entitled to continue in possession, provided he himself fulfils all the conditions stipulated in the deed.[2] Thus, if a lessee is entitled to remain in possession so long as he continues to pay the agreed rent it will be a permanent lease,[3] while, on the other hand, if lessee agrees to vacate the land whenever the lessor wants it, it will only be a tenancy at will.[4]

Where a period is fixed and there are words indicating the continuance of it further, the lease is only for the period fixed and the words indicating further continuance thereof simply appertain to the future consent of the parties and cannot affect the actual fixed period or create a fresh right in favour of any party.[5] Thus, where a house was let at an annual rent of three rupees for a period of one year and the lessee declared "I shall continue to pay the annual rent every year and if I fail to pay the rent in any year, the owner of the house should be at liberty to recover the rent through Court" it was held that the lease was for one year only and that the above clause did not create any rights between the parties beyond that term.[6] See also the undermentioned cases.[7]

Where no period is fixed and there is nothing in the document or the transaction to indicate it, the period will be determined under S. 106 according to the purpose of the lease.

Where there is no document of lease, the nature of the tenancy must be determined from the surrounding circumstances and in particular from the course of dealings by the parties concerned.[8]

4. "From year to year." — A tenancy "from year to year" is a tenancy continuing so long as the parties desire to continue it and though terminable at the option of either party at the end of any year, it is not 'ipso facto' terminated at the end of every year.[1]

Where the period of lease is not specified in the deed, the provision for the annual payment of rent does not necessarily imply that the lease is from year to year. In such cases the period of lease is to be determined under S. 106 according to the purpose of the lease.[2]

therein, "this is to remain in force until another patta is granted" it was held that the lease was not for one year only, as the said words expressed an intention to create or regulate the tenancy beyond the year and from year to year.[3]

As to the meaning of "year" see Note 5.

5. "For any term exceeding one year." — The term "year" has not been defined in this Act. It is defined in S. 3, clause (59) of the General Clauses Act, 1897, as "a year reckoned according to the British calendar." By virtue of S. 4 of that Act that definition is to be adopted in this Act also. In 'Motiram v. Seth Laxmichand[1] where a lease was for a Sambat year i.e., from Kartik Badi 12 Sambat 1976 to Kartik Badi 12 Sambat 1977 corresponding to 20th October 1919 to 7th November 1920, a period which exceeded one year according to the British calendar, and it was argued that the lease must be held to be for a term exceeding one year for the purpose of this section, Baker, J. C., observed: "I am not aware of any law by which a year calculated according to the Sambat calendar amongst Hindi speaking parties should be considered to mean a year according to the British calendar. The intention of the parties was obviously to let the house for a year only and I agree with the lower appellate Court in holding that the lease is not for a term exceeding a year." Subsequently, however, in a case[2] where the facts were exactly similar the lease was held to be for a term exceeding one year both for the purposes of the Registration Act and for the purposes of this section.

Where a tenant is entitled to hold on so long as he pays the stipulated rent or renders the stipulated service, the tenancy is for a term exceeding one year.[3] But where in a lease there is an express term that the lessee shall vacate the property in case he fails to pay the rent or 'whenever the lessor requires him to do so,' the lease is not for a term exceeding one year though a period exceeding one year is mentioned therein as a period of the lease, inasmuch as the lessor can ask the lessee to vacate even the next day and the lessee cannot insist on retaining possession till the expiry of the period fixed.[4]

A lease for the 'life' of a lessee is a lease for a term exceeding one year as it entitles him to hold for more than that period if he lives so long.[5]

Illustrations.

(1) A lease was described as a yearly lease, but no period was fixed and the lessor had the option to terminate the tenancy only if he found out a fraud or deceit on the part of the lessee. It was held that the lease was for a term exceeding one year.[6]

(2) Under the terms of a lease, the lessee was to pay eight annas a year as rent. If the rent was not paid any year or the lessee did not behave properly towards the lessor, the lease was to come to an end automatically. No period was fixed in the lease. It was held that though the lease might continue for an indefinite number of years there was no certainty that it would last beyond the term of one year, and that therefore the lease was not one for a term exceeding one year.[7]

(3) A lease deed provided: "I have taken the land from KH and am building a shop on it. I promise and give it in writing that I shall pay KH every month a rent of annas three per month. In any month in which I fail to pay the rent KH will be competent to have the shop vacated by me." It was held that as the lease contained an express condition for the payment of rent every month and as it was liable to be determined in any month in which a default might be made, it could not be called a lease from year to year or for a term exceeding one year.[8]

(4) A lease deed provided: "I have taken the house on lease on a monthly rent for my personal use. If the owner deems it necessary to have the building vacated he shall give me fifteen days' prior notice whereupon I shall vacate the premises forthwith." It was held that as there was no period fixed and as it could be determined by a fifteen days' notice it was not a lease for a term exceeding one year.[9]

(5) A lease deed provided for the payment of a monthly rent and did not specify any period. It could be terminated on non-payment of rent. But there was no clause to show that it would continue so long as the rent was paid. It was held that, in the absence of such a clause, it could not be said that it would not terminate before the end of the year, and that therefore it was not one for a term exceeding one year.[10]

See also the undermentioned case[11]

6. "Reserving a yearly rent."—The words "reserving a yearly rent" show that the lease is not limited to one year only.[1] A lease reserving a yearly rent, therefore, is one for more than a year and is really a lease from year to year.[2]

A lease for an indefinite period reserving a yearly rent will not cease to be one "reserving a yearly rent" merely because the rent is to be paid in two six monthly instalments.[3] On the other hand a lease which is terminable at the option of the lessor and which, therefore, can end even before the expiry of a year cannot be called a lease "reserving a yearly rent" merely because a yearly rent is mentioned in it.[4] So also a lease which is for a period of one year only cannot be called a lease reserving a yearly rent though there is a mention of an annual rent in the deed.[5]

7. Effect of non-registration. — All leases coming within the first paragraph of this section, namely, leases from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent can be made 'only' by a registered instrument.[1] Where such a lease is evidenced by more documents than one, all such documents must be registered.[2] Where a lease is effected by a registered instrument, an agreement which affects the incidents of the tenure created by the lease and thus forms a part of the lease, must also be registered.[3]

An unregistered document of lease, in cases where the lease is required to be registered conveys no title and creates no rights in the lessee[4] and in the first paragraph makes it clear that leases coming within its scope cannot be created otherwise than by a registered instrument,[1] e.g., by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.[2] But all other leases can, under the second paragraph of the section, be created by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The question arises whether a lease falling within the first paragraph of the section but made only by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession, can be treated as a valid lease of the kind referred to in the second paragraph. It has been held that it can be so treated. Thus, a lease for more than a year, by oral agreement and delivery of possession was treated as a lease for one year.[3] It has also been held that if, in such a case, after the expiry of the first year the lessor accepts rent from the lessee and assents to his continuing in possession the lease is renewed from year to year or month to month under S. 116 according to the purpose of the tenancy.[3a]

Before the year 1904 a lease for one year could be made by an unregistered instrument. Hence, where a lease for fifteen years was granted by an unregistered instrument it was held that though the lease was inoperative for the term of fifteen years it was valid for the first year under the second paragraph of the section and the lessee's possession thereafter was held to be as a tenant holding over with the consent of the lessor.[4]

9. Paragraph 2. — The preceding paragraph deals with leases "from year to year," or for a "term exceeding one year," or "reserving a yearly rent." All these expressions denote a lease for more than a year. This paragraph deals with all "other" leases, i.e., with leases for a term of 'one' year or less. A lease for one year means a lease for a term of one year 'certain.' If there is a possibility of its being undetermined at the end of one year it will not be included in this paragraph but in the preceding paragraph and will have to be made by a registered document.[1]

A lease under this paragraph for a period of one year or less can be effected only in two ways —

(1) by a registered instrument,[2] or
(2) by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession.[3]

The word "registered" occurring before the word "instrument" was inserted in the section only in 1904. Until that year a lease coming within this paragraph, even when effected in writing, was not required to be registered.[4] After that year, however, if a lease coming under this paragraph is effected by an instrument, the instrument must be registered.[5] As to the effect of non-registration of such a document on the transfer, see Note 7.

Number of shareholders over 2,200

As to the second mode of creating a lease referred to above, a mere oral agreement to give a lease is not enough. It must, in order to create a valid lease, be accompanied by delivery of possession.[6] "Delivery of possession" means actual delivery.[7] Where such delivery is not possible, the lease must be effected in the first mode only, i.e., by a registered instrument.[8] But in a recent Full Bench decision of the Lahore High Court it has been held that it is not necessary that delivery of possession must be physical at the time of the agreement and that the delivery of constructive possession is quite sufficient for the purpose of the section.[8a] In that case, mortgage with possession was executed in favour of a person. The mortgagor, however, did not vacate the property but executed a 'kabuliyat' in favour of the mortgagee. The mortgagee afterwards sued for rent. It was held that in the circumstances a lease must be considered to have come into being as the result of the oral agreement and delivery of possession.

Where the lease is effected by an oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession and there is also an unregistered instrument evidencing it, the question arises whether the existence of the unregistered instrument prevents the passing of title by delivery. Under S. 49 of the Registration Act, 1908, before its amendment in 1929, it was held that that section applied to documents compulsorily registrable under the Registration Act only and the document of lease for one year or less, being not compulsorily registrable under the Registration Act, could be admitted in evidence to prove the oral agreement embodied in it which, when accompanied by delivery of possession would create a valid lease.[9] The words "or by any provision of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882" were inserted in 1929 in S. 49 of the Registration Act and it is now clear that the ground that was available for the admissibility of such documents before 1929 is now no longer available.[10] In the undermentioned Madras case,[11] however, decided after the above amendment in S. 49 of the Registration Act, an unregistered document of a lease for one year was admitted in evidence to prove the oral agreement. The amendment was not adverted to and the Court merely followed a Full Bench decision given before the amendment.

When a lease is effected by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession and there is a kabuliat executed by the lessee, it can be admitted in evidence to prove the oral agreement.[12]

Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929. Prior thereto, there was a difference of opinion on the question whether a 'kabuliat' or other document signed by the lessee only could be called a lease-deed within the meaning of this section. One view was that a lease being a transfer under the Act, it could not be effected by a document not signed by the transferor and that consequently a 'kabuliat' being signed by only the lessee could not be called a lease within the meaning of this section.[1] According to the contrary view, a 'kabuliat,' although signed by the lessee, was sufficient to operate as a lease under this section if it was accepted by the lessor.[2]

The third paragraph of the section has now set the conflict at rest and it is now clear that a document signed only by the lessee[3] or only by the lessor[4] will not be operative as a lease under this section. Such a document would, however, be otherwise perfectly valid and would bind the executant by the terms thereof unless he is able to prove fraud or coercion.[5] Thus a person in possession under a 'kabuliat,' though not liable to pay rent, is liable to pay whatever is due under the 'kabuliat as compensation for the use and occupation of the land.[6]

Where there are more lessors than one or more lessees than one, 'all' of them must join in the execution of the instrument, unless the executing lessors or the lessees, as the case may be, had authority to sign on behalf of the others also.[7]

11. Proviso. — The proviso deals with leases coming under the second paragraph of the section. It empowers the Provincial Government to exempt such leases from the formality of registration when they are made in writing and from delivery of possession when they are made otherwise.[1]

This power has been exercised by the Government of Bombay by a notification[2] and the result is that in the Presidency of Bombay a lease for a term of one year or less can be made either by an unregistered document or by merely an oral agreement. The present Province of Sind was a part of the Bombay Presidency at the time of the above notification and hence it applied to Sind also.[3] whomsoever; but every such grant and transfer shall be construed and take effect as if the said Act had not been passed."

It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad that the concluding portion of the above section shows that the Courts can disregard the provisions of this Act only where a question of the construction of a grant arises[1] that those provisions which deal with the formality of a transfer do not affect the 'construction' of a grant and that therefore a lease even by Government, must be made according to the provisions of this section.[2] The High Court of Patna has taken a contrary view in the undermentioned case.[3] According to the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Oudh[4] the provisions of S. 107 of the Transfer of Property Act are applicable to leases by Government but that section being supplemental to the Registration Act and leases by Government being excepted from registration by S. 90 (1) (d) of the same Act, Government leases are exempted from the provisions of S. 107 of this Act also. The High Court of Madras has held that a licence given by Government to prospect red oxide of iron in land is not required to be registered as it is in the nature of a Crown grant.[5]

13. Lease embodied in a decree or order of a Court.—When the parties to a suit enter into a compromise by which a lease is granted by one to the other and the compromise is embodied in the decree or order of the Court, the lease cannot be said to be one by operation of law or in execution of a decree or order of a Court within the meaning of S. 2 (d) and will not be exempt form the provisions of this section.

Under the Registration Act also such decrees or orders are not exempt from registration under S. 17 (2) (vi) of the Act as the exemption under that clause only applies to cases coming under clauses (b) and (c) of sub-section (1) of S. 17 and not to cases under clause (d) of that sub-section—which is the clause applicable to leases.[1]

When a decree or order does not purport to create a lease and only recognises it, it need not be registered either under the Registration Act[2] or for the purposes of this Act.

14. Leases and the doctrine of part performance. — The doctrine of part performance embodied in S. 53A is applicable also to leases. (See Notes on that section.) That section enables the lessee to take certain defences if a suit is brought against him by the lessor to enforce rights other than those embodied in the deed. Section 27A of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, which also embodies the principle of part performance goes further and allows the lessee a positive right to get the unregistered lease deed registered by a suit for the specific performance of the contract to grant the lease.[1]

15. Agreement to lease. — This is one of the sections referred to in S. 4 which must be read as supplemental to the Registration Act. "Lease" is defined both in the Registration Act as well as in this Act. But the definition that is to be adopted for the purpose of this section in that which is given in this Act in S. 105.[1] The result is that an agreement to lease, which is not of a lease according to the definition given in S. 105 of this Act, is not required to be registered for the purpose of this section, though under the Registration Act, S. 2 (7), a lease has been defined as including, 'inter alia' an "agreement to lease".[2] But even for the purpose of the Registration Act, it is the settled view now that registration is only compulsory if there is a present demise and not where the agreement is a merely executory one.[2a] (See also S. 105 Note 4.)

An agreement to lease does not, of itself, create any interest in or charge on, the property agreed to be leased.[3]

Where an agreement to lease under which the parties reserve a yearly rent is not followed by a duly registered document and the proposed lessee enters into possession of the property, his possession is only that of a licensee.[4] See also S. 105, Notes 4 and 19. An 'oral' agreement to grant a lease is valid and enforceable.[5]

Rights and liabilities of lessor and lessee.

108. In the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, the lessor and the lessee of immoveable property, as against one another, respectively, possess the rights and are subject to the liabilities mentioned in the rules next following, or such of them as are applicable to the property leased :—

(A) Rights and Liabilities of the Lessor.

(a) The lessor is bound to disclose to the lessee any material defect in the property, with reference to its intended use, of which the former is and the latter is not aware, and which the latter could not with ordinary care discover :

(b) the lessor is bound on the lessee's request to put him in possession of the property :

(c) the lessor shall be deemed to contract with the lessee that, if the latter pays the rent reserved by the lease and performs the contracts binding on the lessee, he may hold the property during the time limited by the lease without interruption.

(f) if the lessor neglects to make, within a reasonable time after notice, any repairs which he is bound to make to the property, the lessee may make the same himself, and deduct the expense of such repairs with interest from the rent, or otherwise recover it from the lessor :

(g) if the lessor neglects to make any payment which he is bound to make, and which, if not made by him, is recoverable from the lessee or against the property, the lessee may make such payment himself, and deduct it with interest from the rent, or otherwise recover it from the lessor :

(h) the lessee may [a][even after the determination of the lease] remove, at any time [b][whilst he is in possession of the property leased but not afterwards] all things which he has attached to the earth : provided he leaves the property in the state in which he received it :

(i) when a lease of uncertain duration determines by any means except the fault of the lessee, he or his legal representative is entitled to all the crops planted or sown by the lessee and growing upon the property when the lease determines, and to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them :

(j) the lessee may transfer absolutely or by way of mortgage or sub-lease the whole or any part of his interest in the property, and any transferee of such interest or part may again transfer it. The lessee shall not, by reason only of such transfer, cease to be Subject to any of the liabilities attaching to the lease :

nothing in this clause shall be deemed to authorize a tenant having an untransferable right of occupancy, the farmer of an estate in respect of which default has been made in paying revenue, or the lessee of an estate under the management of a Court of Wards, to assign his interest as such tenant, farmer or lessee :

(k) the lessee is bound to disclose to the lessor any fact as to the nature or extent of the interest which the lessee is about to take, of which the lessee is, and the lessor is not, aware, and which materially increases the value of such interest :

(l) the lessee is bound to pay or tender, at the proper time and place, the premium or rent to the lessor or his agent in this behalf :

(m) the lessee is bound to keep, and on the termination of the lease to restore, the property in as good condition as it was in at the time when he was put in possession, subject only to the changes caused by reasonable wear and tear or irresistible force, and to allow the lessor and his agents, at all reasonable times during the term, to enter upon the property and inspect the condition thereof and give or leave notice of any defect in such condition, and, when such defect has been caused by any act or default on the part of the lessee, his servants or agents, he is bound to make it good within three months after such notice has been given or left:

(n) if the lessee becomes aware of any proceeding to recover the property or any part thereof, or of any encroachment made upon, or any interference, with, the lessor's rights concerning such property, he is bound to give, with reasonable diligence, notice thereof to the lessor:

(o) the lessee may use the property and its products (if any) as a person of ordinary prudence would use them if they were his own; but he must not use, or permit another to use, the property for a purpose other than that for which it was leased, or fell [c][or sell] timber, pull down or damage buildings [c][belonging to the lessor, or] work mines or quarries not open when the lease was granted, or commit any other act which is destructive or permanently injurious thereto:

(p) he must not, without the lessor's consent, erect on the property any permanent structure, except for agricultural purposes:

(q) on the determination of the lease, the lessee is bound to put the lessor into possession of the property.

Section 108 (General).

1. Scope of the section. — This section lays down the rights and liabilities of the lessor and the lessee. All or nearly all the clauses are expressions of well settled principles familiar to the law of England.[1] The rights and liabilities are made subject to a contract or local usage to the contrary.

The section does not in terms apply to agricultural leases but the principles underlying the various clauses have been generally applied to such leases[2] and to leases arising in provinces to which the Act does not apply.[3]

Section 73 provides for the payment of mortgage amount to the mortgagee in cases where the mortgaged property has been acquired under the Land Acquisition Act. There is no similar provision as to the lessee's right under such circumstances. On principle, however, the lessee will be entitled

Section 108 Clause (a)

Synopsis

1. Duty to disclose defect.
2. Defect in proptrty, if includes defect in title.
3. Effect of breach of obligation.
4. Breach of obligation, not fraudulent.

1. Duty to disclose defect.—This clause is worded in terms similar to clause (a) of S. 55, sub-section (1). Analogous provisions are also found in S. 150 of the Contract Act relating to the bailment of goods, and S 57 of the Easements Act, relating to licences.

The lessor is bound, under this clause, to disclose to the lessee all latent defects which are material and of which he is aware and the lessee is not aware. If the lessee is aware of the defect or could, with ordinary care, have discovered the defect, he cannot claim that the lessor has committed a breach of the obligation under this clause.[1]

The defect which the lessor is under an obligation to disclose under this clause must have reference to its 'intended use.' Where there was a thatch over a chimney in the leased premises of which the lessor was aware but not the lessee, and the furniture of the lessee was destroyed by a fire arising from the chimney, it was held by the Calcutta High Court that the lessor had committed a breach of the obligation to disclose the defect and was liable in damages.[2]

But the duty to disclose a defect under this clause is not the same thing as a warranty that the premises demised are fit for the intended use. A warrantly has no reference to the knowledge of the warrantor or the want of a knowledge of the warrantee, whereas the obligation under this clause arises only where the lessor is aware and the lessee is not aware of the defect. Under the English law there is no warranty of fitness in the case of a demise of a land or of unfurnished dwelling houses.[3] In the undermentioned case[4] before the Act it was held by the Punjab Court that there is a warranty of fitness in the case of a demised house. It is clear that in cases falling under this clause there is no warranty of fitness of the premises for the purpose for which they are intended to be used.[5]

2. Defect in property, if includes defect in title. — Under the English Common Law a contract for a lease implied also a contract that the lessor had a title to grant the lease.[1] By statute,[2] however, the right of the intending lessee to call for the title of the lessor has been taken away. The words "defect in property with reference to its intended use" in this clause make it clear that the obligation to disclose the defect does not include a defect in the title of a lessor. As has been pointed out by the Calcutta High Court,[3] a defect in property with reference to its intended use has a reference to the 'nature and condition' of the property and not title to the property. It may also be noted that S. 55, sub-s. (1), clause (a) clearly makes a distinction between a defect in property and a defect in seller's title thereto.

But though the lessor is not, under this clause, bound to disclose a defect in title, as part of his obligation to disclose a defect in property, he is bound to 'give' a good title to the lessee. Where the lessee discovers, before the lease is executed, that the lessor has no title to grant the lease, he may resile from the contract. In 'Jyotiprosad Singh v. H. V. Low & Co. Ltd.,[4] Rankin, C. J., observed as follows:

> "I do not think that the Indian law makes a distinction in principle between the obligation of a lessor and of a vendor so far as regards the duty to give a good title, though the incidents of these different types of transfers may be different as regards the obligation to give 'disclosure' and furnish a proof thereof."

This view was affirmed, on appeal, by their Lordships of the Privy Council.[5] In the undermentioned case[6] where the lessor was found to have no title to the land, with the result that the lessee did not get possession of the property leased, the High Court of Nagpur held, following the above view, that the lessee was entitled to recover the premium paid by him.

3. Effect of breach of obligation.—A breach of the obligation imposed by this clause will, if discovered before the lease is granted, enable the lessee to avoid the contract. The intending lessee may also defend himself against a suit for specific performance of the agreement.[1] Where the lease is executed, the effect of the breach of the obligation will, if he has suffered any damages thereby, enable the lessee to sue for damages.[2]

4. Breach of obligation, not fraudulent. — A breach of the obligation under cl. (a) of S. 55, sub-s. (1) has been declared by the last paragraph of that section as being fraudulent. There is no corresponding provision to that effect in this section.

1. Obligation to give possession.

3. Failure to give possession—Effect.
4. Contract to the contrary.

1. Obligation to give possession. — Under the English law he who lets, agrees to give possession; that is to say, in every lease there is an 'implied contract' that the lessor will give possession of the land to the lessee.[1] This principle was applied to cases in this country even before the passing of this Act.[2] This clause imposes a 'statutory obligation' to the same effect and is thus an enactment in substance of what the law was before.[3] The question as to what amounts to delivery of possession in any particular case will depend on the nature of the property leased.[4] Where the property leased is rent payable by tenants, the giving of notice to the tenant to attorn in future to the lessee amounts to a delivery of possession of the leased property to the lessee.[5] But it is necessary that the lessor himself must have possession to give to the lessee. The fact that the lessee can take legal proceedings to recover possession himself from the party in occupation will not relieve the lessor from his obligation to deliver possession.[6]

A lease by a person who is not in possession is, however, not 'ipso facto' void.[7] The lessee's suit against a third person in possession on the strength of the lease cannot be dismissed on the ground that the lease was void for the reason that the lessor had no possession.[8]

The onus is on the lessor to show, in a suit for rent, that he has discharged his obligation to put the lessee in possession.[9] But where the tenant has already paid the rent under the lease[10] or where the lessee claims that certain subjects of which he has not got possession are within the subjects let,[11] the 'onus' will be on the lessee to show that he did not get possession.

The question as to when the possession is to be delivered under the lease will depend upon the terms of the contract in the particular case.[12]

2. "On the lessee's request." — The lessor is, under this clause, bound to give possession to the lessee only on the 'request' of the lessee.[1] He is not bound to put an unwilling and recalcitrant lessee into possession against his will.[2] In an old case before the Act, it was held that there was no obligation on the part of the lessee to require the lessor to give possession.[3] It has also been held in some cases that a request by the lessee is not necessary in cases where, to the knowledge of both the lessor and the lessee, the property is not in the possession of the lessor,[4] but that the lessor is bound to make it possible for the lessee to take possession by removing third persons from possession.[5]

3. Failure to give possession — Effect. — A lessee to whom possession has not been delivered by the lessor can sue him for damages for breach of the obligation.[1] He can also sue for possession of the property demised. The lessor cannot, in answer to such a suit claim that the lessee has failed to pay the stipulated premium, unless the document provides that the lessee is not to have possession until the premium is paid.[2] Where a third party is in possession, the lessee can sue such third party for possession.[3] Thus, where A leases certain properties to B for a certain period and then leases the same properties to C for a further period after the expiry of B's lease, C can, after such expiry, sue B for possession.[4]

The lessee may also repudite or rescind the whole contract for failure of the lessor to give possession under S. 55 of the Contract Act,[5] though he cannot do this where he takes possession of a portion of the demised property.[6] If he rescinds the whole contract he can, if he had paid any premium or other consideration for the lease, recover it back from the lessor.[7]

In a recent decision of the Privy Council,[8] a relief by way of 'specific performance' has also been referred to as one of the ordinary remedies of a tenant who is not given possession of the property or any part thereof. See also clause (c), Note 8.

As to whether the lessee can withhold payment of rent or claim abatement or suspension of the rent to any extent on the lessor's failure to give possession in whole or in part, see Notes on clause (l).

4. Contract to the contrary. — The clause is subject to a contract to the contrary. Where the lessee agrees, by the contract of tenancy, that he will himself take possession of the leased property the agreement is a "contract to the contrary" and the lessor has no duty to place the lessee in possession.[1]

Section 108 Clause (c).

Synopsis

1. Scope.
2. "Without interruption."
3. Interruption by holder of paramount title.
4. Interruption by trespasser.
5. "Shall be deemed to contract."
6. Benefit of covenant runs with the land.
7. Crown grants.
8. Effect of breach of covenant.

1. Scope. — In England an express covenant for quiet enjoyment is usually inserted in every lease. Where no covenant is inserted in the lease the law implies such a covenant from the use of the word "demise" or even from a mere contract of letting in whatever form it is expressed.[1] The express covenant may be either in a qualified form or in an unqualified form, though usually, it is in a qualified form, that is to say, it protects the lessee from interruption 'by the lessor or by persons claiming under him,' but not from interruption by third persons. The implied covenant also is only a limited covenant.[2] This clause gives the lessee in India the same rights as he would have under what, in England, is a covenant for quiet enjoyment in an 'unqualified form'. In other words the lessee is protected against interruption by 'whomsoever' it is occasioned.[3]

But though the implied contract under this clause if for quiet possession against interruption by whomsoever caused, it has reference, where it is caused by a third party, only to a 'lawful' eviction. It does not extend to maintaining the lessee's possession against unlawful or tortious evictions by third parties.[4] The reason is that against such acts the lessee has his proper remedy against the wrong-doers.[5] As pointed out by Rankin, C. J., in 'Indubhushan v. Moazam Ali.'[6]

> "No lessor can guarantee that his lessee will not be subject to trespass or wrongful acts on the part of a third party. What he does covenant is that his title is such that no lawful entry or eviction or interruption will occur."

The words "if the latter pays the rent reserved by the lease and performs the contracts binding on the lessee" do not make the payment of rent and the performance of the contracts 'conditions precedent' to the enforceability of the obligation to secure quiet enjoyment.[7] This is also the English law on the point. In a covenant for quiet enjoyment by the lessee the usual qualification "by paying the rent thereby reserved and performing the covenants" does not make the payment of rent, etc., a condition precedent to the performance of the covenant by the lessor.[8] The covenant, if it is express, holds good during the whole of the term expressed to be granted by the lease and not merely during the actual continuance of the estate of the lessor.[9] Where a lease is to commence in future, the lessee cannot, before his right to possession accrues, sue for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.[10]

2. "Without interruption." — In order to constitute an interruption within the meaning of this clause there must be a substantial interference with the enjoyment by the lessee of the leased property.[1] Actual dispossession is, however, not necessary.[2] Disturbance of enjoyment which is merely temporary and which does not interfere with the title or possession of the lessee is not a breach of obligation.[3]

Where there is an interruption of enjoyment under compulsion of a statute it has been held in England that there is no breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.[4] Where the lessee was evicted by the Plague Authorities under the powers vested in them by law, it was held by the Bombay High Court that there was no breach on the part of the lessor of the covenant for quiet enjoyment.[5] In the undermentioned case,[6] however, where land was leased for being used for sale of firewood, but the municipality refused permission for such sale, it was held by the Oudh Chief Court that the lessor did not secure the lessee possession with reference to its intended use, and that there was a breach of the obligation to secure quiet enjoyment. It is submitted that this view does not seem to be correct.

3. Interruption by holder of paramount title.—An interruption of the lessee's enjoyment by the holder of a paramount title is an "interruption" within the meaning of this clause.[1] This follows from the principle stated in

Note 1 that the covenant for quiet possession under this clause extends to all lawful evictions by third parties. A title paramount means a title superior to that of the lessor, i.e., a title against which a lessor cannot make a valid defence.[2] Where a third person files a suit against the lessee without making the lessor a party, and, in execution of the decree, dispossesses the lessee it cannot be said that such dispossession is necessarily by a person with paramount title.[3] But where a lessor is made a party the dispossession will be by the owner of the paramount title.[4]

4. Interruption by trespasser. — As seen in Note 1, the covenant under this clause does not extend to 'tortious' acts of third parties. Where, therefore, the lessee is evicted or interrupted in his enjoyment of his property by a trespasser, the lessor cannot be said to have committed any breach of his obligation under this clause. In such cases the lessee can himself sue the trespasser for ejectment. There is a difference of opinion on the question whether the lessor himself can sue the trespasser for possession in such cases. In 'Ramanathan v. Pulikutty[1]' it was held by the Madras High Court that the lessor, not being entitled to possession himself after the execution of the lease, was not entitled to sue the trespasser for possession. This view has not been followed by that Court in later cases. It has been held that a lessor, although he has granted lease to another is entitled for the purpose of putting the lessee in possession, to maintain a suit to eject the trespasser.[2] It has also been held that if the lessor's right to the reversion is affected by the trespass he will be entitled to a declaration of title and to the delivery of "formal" possession by proclamation of his reversionary right.[3] The same view, namely, that the lessor is entitled to sue to eject the trespasser for the purpose of putting the lessee in possession has been taken by the Calcutta and Patna High Courts also.[4]

There is also a difference of opinion as to whether a lessor can maintain a suit for ejectment under S. 9 of the Specific Relief Act. According to one view he is not entitled to maintain such a suit.[5] A contrary view is that he can maintain such a suit.[6] It is submitted that the latter view is to be preferred.

5. "Shall be deemed to contract." — The covenant for quiet enjoyment in this clause is deemed to be a part of the contract and to be read into the contract. The other clauses of this section are merely 'statutory obligations' and are not deemed to be part of the contract itself.[1]

6. Benefit of covenant runs with the land.—The paragraph following this clause applies only to this clause and not to clause (a) or (b). Consequently, it is only the benefit of a covenant for quiet enjoyment that runs with the land and not the benefit of the obligations under clauses (a) or (b).[1]

As will be seen in the Notes on S. 111, the right of a lessee in the lease is a heritable right.[2] By virtue of clause (j) of this section it is also a transferable right. The legal representatives of the lessee or the assignee of the lessee will therefore be entitled to enforce the covenant for quiet enjoyment given by this clause.[3]

7. Crown grants. — This Act does not apply to Crown grants by virtue of the provisions of the Crown Grants Act, XV of 1895. But it has been held that the provisions of this section may be referred to in order to determine the nature of the ordinary covenants by which the lessor and the lessee are bound.[1]

8. Effect of breach of covenant. — Where, after the lease is executed the covenant for quiet enjoyment is broken by the lessor, the lessee is entitled to sue the lessor for damages as on breach of a contract.[1] The measure of damages in such a case will, as in the case of any other contract, have to be determined by reference to S. 73 of the Contract Act. But a claim for damages is not the only remedy of the lessee. He can sue the lessor for specific performance of the contract by putting him in possession.[2] He can

Section 108 Clause (d).

Synopsis

1. Accession.
2. Accretion to land by alluvion.
3. Encroachment by tenant.
4. "Shall be deemed to be comprised in the lease."

1. Accession. — A lessee is under this clause entitled to any accessions made to the demised property during the continuance of the lease.[1] As to the meaning of the word "accession," see generally Note 1 on S. 63 and Note 2 on S. 70. The question whether a particular addition to the demised property is an "accession" must be decided, as seen in the said Notes, in the light of various facts — upon the intention of the parties, upon the law applicable to the particular case and in some cases upon both these things.

2. Accretion to land by alluvion. — Under the English law where there is an acquisition of land from the sea or a river by 'gradual, slow and imperceptible' means then, from the supposed necessity of the case and the difficulty of having to determine year by year to whom an inch, or a foot, or a yard belongs, the accretion by alluvion is held to belong to the owner of the adjoining land.[1] This principle was applied by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of 'Felix Lopez v. Muddun Mohun[2] and by the Allahabad High Court in 'Narendra v. Achhaibar.[3] In 'Raja Srinath Roy v.

Lessee suing all co-sharers to enforce lease or for damages—Held, claim for damages was maintainable under Specific Relief Act, S. 19.)

Dinabandhu Sen[4]' their Lordships of the Privy Council, however, observed as follows :

> " It is to be observed that here too Indian law doubtless guided by local physical conditions, has adopted a rule varying somewhat from the rule established in this country. Where under English conditions the rule applies to 'imperceptible' alterations, Regulation XI of 1825 (Bengal), Arts. 1 and 4, speak of 'gradual accession.' The analogy of the English rule can hardly be prayed in aid when Indian legislation has thus an established and different rule on the same subject. Further, as the 'Indian rule is established now beyond question,' it may perhaps be said without offence of the Indian as of the English rule, that it represents rather a compromise of convenience than an ideal of justice, for, that which is a man's own does not become another's any more agreeably to ideal justice by being filched from him gradually instead of being swallowed whole."

The decision of 'Srinath Roy's case' has been regarded as settling the view, so far as this country is concerned, that an accretion need not be 'imperceptible'[5] See also the undermentioned cases[6] under Bengal Regulation XI of 1825 under which an accretion is required only to be gradual and not imperceptible.

Where the accretion to land is 'sudden' and not gradual it cannot be said to become part and parcel of the land to which it is added and so does not constitute an " accession." If a land is submerged and is again re-formed and can be identified as forming part of a particular estate the owner of that estate is entitled to it.[7]

It was held in 'Secretary of State v. Kadirkutti[8]' that even though an accretion has been brought about artificially and not by natural causes, the party bringing it about may become entitled to it, but that the rule will not apply where it is brought about intentionally with the motive of getting the benefit of accretion. This view was rested on the decision in 'Attorney-General v. Chambers.'[9] The view expressed in the last mentioned case appears, however, to be no longer good law in view of the decision of the House of Lords in 'The Mayor of Bradford Corporation v. Pickels'[10] where it has been held that, provided that an act is done lawfully, the party cannot be deprived of any benefit that may be derived from such act by reason merely of the fact that his motive is bad.

3. Encroachment by tenant.—A tenant encroaching upon other property of the landlord does not, merely by reason of such encroachment, become a tenant of such property also. His possession will be really adverse to the landlord. To what extent it would be adverse would, however, depend upon the nature of the right in assertion of which the adverse possession was held. Where the tenant is in adverse possession claiming an absolute right in the land he would acquire by prescription an absolute title to the land. But where he claims to be a tenant of the land he will acquire a tenant's right in the land. The 'presumption' is, however, that he only claims the additional land as part of the land. "The true presumption," said Markby, J., in 'Gooroo Doss Roy v. Issur Chunder.[1]' "as to encroachments made by the tenant during his tenancy upon the adjoining lands of his landlord is that the lands so encroached upon are added to the tenure, and form part thereof for the benefit of the tenant so long as the original holding continues, and afterwards for the benefit of the landlord, unless it clearly appeared by some act done at the time that the tenant made encroachments for his own benefit."[2]

Before the tenant acquires by prescription an absolute title, or the tenancy right the landlord can eject the lessee from the portion encroached upon.[3] Where the lessor treats the lessee as a tenant in respect of the encroachment while the latter professes to hold it as part and parcel of the leased property, the two plots constitute one tenancy and stand on the same footing.[4] After a title by prescription has been acquired by the lessee to the tenancy rights, the lessor cannot eject the lessee before the termination of the lease.[5] If the lessee has acquired a full title by prescription the landlord's title will be extinguished.[5a]

Where the tenant encroaches on land which adjoins his holding but which belongs to a person 'other than the landlord' the possession of such land may be adverse to the owner thereof. But the presumption in this case also is that he has made the encroachment, not for his own benefit, but for that of his landlord,[6] and the burden of proof is on the tenant to show that the encroachment was for his own benefit.[7] A subsequent severance of the encroached portion from the demised property is sufficient to rebut the said presumption.[8]

Where the lessor is entitled to the benefit of an encroachment on the principles stated above, he will be entitled to claim, and the tenant will be bound to pay, additional rent for the excess area.[9] After the termination of the lease, the lessee would also be bound to hand over the excess area to the landlord along with the property originally demised.[10]

4. "Shall be deemed to be comprised in the lease." — The accession becomes under this clause a part of the leased property. According to the English law the covenants to repair, etc., in the lease extend also by implication to the encroachments and the buildings thereon.[1]

Synopsis

2. "Flood."
3. "Substantially and permanently unfit."
4. "At the option of the lessee."
5. Proviso.
6. Effect of repudiation.
7. Contract to the contrary.

1. Scope. — This clause enacts a rule which appears to be somewhat different from the English law. Under that law, the fact that the demised property is destroyed by flood or fire or lightning or by the violence of an army is not a ground for the tenant to free himself from the liabilities under the lease unless there is an express contract or convenant to the effect.[1] In a recent case[1a] Lord Russell of Killowen and Lord Goddard observed that the doctrine of frustration can never apply to put an end to a lease while Lord Seimon L. C. and Lord Wright held that the doctrine may in certain circumstances apply. Under this clause the fact that the demised property is destroyed or substantially and permanently rendered unfit will, apart from any contract, enable the lessee, at his option, to put an end to the lease. But the clause has reference only to cases of positive actual destruction or injury by some 'violent force.' It has no reference to the case of the property becoming unprofitable or unfit for cultivation through the failure of its ordinary water supply or through something not happening which was expected to happen.[2] Thus, the failure of rain is not a ground under this clause for avoiding the lease.[3]

2. "Flood". — It was held in 'Subramania Pattar' v. 'Kattambath Rama[1]' that the word "flood" in this clause must be restricted to sea-water flooding and not fresh water flooding. This view was, however, dissented from by Venkatasubba Rao, J., in the undermentioned case.[2]

3. "Substantially and permanently unfit." — The words "substantially and permanently unfit" imply that the damage must be so great that the land could not be rendered fit for cultivation at a reasonable expenditure during any portion of the remaining period of the lease.[1] The burden of proof will be on the lessee to establish that the demised property was rendered substantially and permanently unfit.[2] Where a part of a house was rendered dangerous for habitation by reason of an earthquake shock, it was held by the Allahabad High Court that that cannot be said to render the house substantially and permanently unfit" for residence.[3] Where a godown was burnt down so badly that it could not be repaired within three months it was held by the Bombay High Court that it was rendered substanially and permanently unfit for use.[4] In another Bombay case it was held that an eviction of the tenant from the demised premises by the Plague Authorities acting under the Epidemic Diseases Act (III of 1897) could not be said to render the premises permanently unfit within the meaning of this clause.[5] It is submitted that such an eviction cannot, even otherwise, be regarded as falling within any of the categories of fire, tempest, flood, violence of an army or mob or other irresistible force.

The inability of the lessee of salt works to carry on his work owing to the strike of the workers cannot be said to have rendered the leased property substantially unfit by reason of any of the causes mentioned in this clause.[6] In the undermentioned case[7] the lease was one for agricultural purposes not governed in terms by this clause. The land leased were silted up by floods, but it was possible to put them right by means of certain expenditure. It was held that the tenancy cannot be put an end to.

4. "At the option of the lessee." — The lease does not 'ipso facto' become void on the destruction, etc., of the premises; only the exercise of the option by the lessee will render it void from the moment of such exercise.[1] The exercise of the option need not be by any written notice; nor need such notice, if given, require any length of time for its operation.[2] The option must, however, be exercised within a reasonable time of the occurrence.[3] Otherwise the lessee cannot be allowed to repudiate the lease.[4] The question as to what is reasonable time will depend upon the facts and circumstances of the case.[5] In the undermentioned case[6] it was held that there was no valid exercise of option until the lessee delivered possession of the property to the lessor. It is submitted that this view is not correct.

But the fact that the lessee has not exercised his option to avoid the lease under this clause will not render him liable, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to restore the property to the lessor in its original state by repairing or re-building the premises[7] though he would continue to be liable for the rent until the determination of the lease.[8]

5. Proviso. — If the injury is caused by the wrongful act or default of the lessee himself he cannot get the benefit of this clause. The reason is that no person can derive any advantage from his own wrong. On the other hand, the lessee may be liable to pay damages to the lessor.[1] Where, owing to the neglect of the lessee himself for failure to give intimation as required by the rules, he was evicted by the Plague Authorities, it was held that he was not thereby absolved from the liabilities under the lease.[2] A rented certain premises in which he had stored a large number of bales of piece-goods, and put a watchman in charge, who, one night, lit a hanging light in close proximity to the goods, locked up the premises and went away. The premises were destroyed by fire. It was held that the fire was caused through A's default within the meaning of this clause.[3]

6. Effect of repudiation. — Where the lessee validly repudiates the lease by exercising the option given to him by this clause, he can refuse to pay future rent in respect of the premises.[1] He can also sue the lessor to recover, under S. 65 of the Contract Act, any rent or premium which he had paid already for the period after the repudiation.[2] But the lessee is bound after repudiation to restore vacant possession to the lessor under clause (q).

If he fails to do so he will be liable to the lessor for damages.[3] If, however, the lessor accepts rent from the lessee, the latter will become, under S. 116, a tenant from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose for which the property was leased.[4]

7. Contract to the contrary. — S. 108 (e) can not be involved where the parties to a lease have themselves provided for the contingencies referred to. Thus where the parties have specifically agreed that in spite of land being lost by delunion or damage being caused by flooding the lessee would remain liable to pay the whole of the rent stipulated for. S. 108 (e) will have no application. (1)

Section 108 Clause (f).

Synopsis

1. Scope.
2. Remedy of the lessee.
3. Contract to the contrary.

1. Scope. — There is no general rule of law that a lessor is bound to keep the demised property in good repair or to expend any money on the property.[1] Nor is the lessor liable to compensate the lessee for any loss sustained by him by reason of want of repair.[2] The lessee himself is under a qualified obligation in that respect under clause (m).[3]

But the parties may enter into a contract that the lessor should make certain repairs. In such cases the lessor would be bound on notice being given to that effect,[4] to effect such repairs. This clause applies to such cases. The failure of the lessor to effect the repairs will not entitle the lessee to 'terminate' the lease.[5] It will only enable him to effect such repairs himself and deduct the expense of such repairs from the rent or otherwise recover it from the lessor.[6]

2. Remedy of the lessee. — The clause provides that the lessee who himself makes the repairs which, under the contract of lease, the lessor is bound to make, may deduct such expense from the rent or otherwise may recover it from the lessor. It has been held that he can also claim damages against the lessor for breach of his obligation.[1] He can, in a suit for rent by the lessor, claim to set off such damages against the rent.[2] Where he has himself carried out the repairs he can, in a suit for rent, counter-claim for the money so spent.[3] But he cannot claim specific performance against the lessor by compelling him to carry out the repairs.[4]

The words "or otherwise recover it from the lessor" give a right of reimbursement to the lessee apart from his right of deduction of the expense from rent.[5] It has been held in the undermentioned case[6] that the claim to reimbursement would be under S. 70 of the Contract Act.

3. Contract to the contrary. — Where under the terms of tenancy, the lessee is himself bound to make the repairs at his own expense, he cannot claim anything from the lessor on that account,[1] or deduct the value of the repairs from the rent due.[2] Where the contract provides that it is the lessor that must make the repairs and that the lessee should have no right to do so, the latter, if he effects the repair, cannot deduct the expenditure from the rent.[3] Where the contract expressly provides that if the lessor does not make the repair, the lessee should make it 'and deduct the costs from the rent', he cannot claim damages against the lessor for non-repair.[4]

Section 108 Clause (g).

Synopsis

1. Scope.
2. "Which he is bound to make."
3. Right to damages and reimbursement.
4. Contract to the contrary.

1. Scope. — Under the English law, a lessee who, under actual or implied compulsion, has paid any rate or tax which the landlord is liable to pay, may deduct the amount from his rent unless there is an express covenant or stipulation to the contrary.[1] This is the principle which is found enacted in this clause. This clause is, however, in some respects, wider than the English law. It is not limited to the payment of rates and taxes. Further, unlike the English law, it is not necessary that the deduction should be made only from the rent of the current year and not afterwards.[2] A lessee claiming the benefit of this clause must show—

(a) that the lessor is bound to make the payment,
(b) that he neglected to do so,
(c) that the amount was recoverable from the lessee or against the property leased, and

(d) that he made such payment himself.

It may be noted that the lessee is not bound, as he is required under clause (f), to give any notice to the lessor before making the payment himself.

This clause does not apply in terms to agricultural leases. But the principle underlying it is of general applicability[3] and is applicable to agricultural lease also as being in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience.[4]

2. "Which he is bound to make." — In order that the lessee may take advantage of this clause he must show that the lessor was bound to make the payment which he (the lessee) has made. Where, in execution of a decree against the lessor his interest was sold in auction and the lessee thereafter deposited the decree amount under O. 21 R. 89 of the Civil Procedure Code and claimed to recover the same from the lessor, it was held by the Calcutta High Court that, after the sale, the lessor could not be said to be bound to make any payment and that, consequently, the payment by the lessee would not come within this clause.[1]

Where property which was subject to a maintenance charge payable by A was leased by him to B and, on failure of A to pay the maintenance, B paid it, it was held that, inasmuch as the maintenance might have been collected by the sale of the leased property, B can deduct the amount so paid from the rent due.[2] Where the property leased is subject to a mortgage, the lessor, in view of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, may be said to be bound to pay the mortgage, as between himself and the lessee. Consequently, if the lessee pays off the mortgage he can invoke the benefit of this clause.[3]

The general rule is that the lessor is bound to pay the Government revenue of the leased property. If the lessor fails to pay it the lessee may make the payment and recover it from the lessor.[4] It has been held that even if the Government assessment is increased after the lease is granted it is the lessor that is bound to make the increased payment also.[5] But where the rent fixed was Rs. 19, and the Government assessment which was originally Re. 0-15-3 was raised to Rs. 59-8-6, it was held that the implication of the contract of lease must be taken to be, that up to the rent amount of Rs. 19 the landlord is liable for the Government assessment and that the lessee is responsible beyond that amount.[6] Where the tenant undertook to pay the whole of the cesses which were levied under the Bengal Cess Act (1880) at the time of contract of lease, inclusive of the share payable by the tenant and also of the share payable by the landlord, it was held that if the amount of

See also the undermentioned cases.[8]

3. Right to damages and reimbursement. — A lessee making a payment under this clause may not only deduct the amount so paid from the rent, but may also be entitled to claim damages against the lessor for breach of the obligation to make the payment.[1] He can also recover the amount so paid from the lessor under Ss. 69 and 70 of the Contract Act.[2]

4. Contract to the contrary. — Where the lessee has himself undertaken to make a payment which the lessor was bound to pay, there is a contract to the contrary and the lessee cannot get the benefit of this clause. On the other hand, if the lessor himself pays it he can recover it from the lessee.[1] If his property is sold owing to the failure of the lessee to make the payment, the lessor will be entitled to damages against the lessee.[2]

Synopsis

1. Legislative changes.
2. Scope of the clause.
3. Time for removal.
4. Right to compensation.
5. "Attached to the earth."
6. Void lease.
7. Property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act.
8. Contract to the contrary.

1. Legislative changes.

(1) The words "even after the determination of the lease" are new and were inserted by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) The words "whilst he is in possession of the property leased but not afterwards" were substituted for the words "during the continuance of the lease." As to the reason for this amendment, see the Report of the Special Committee.

2. Scope of the clause. — Under the Roman Civil law a tenant was entitled to remove all fixtures which he had attached to the lease-hold property where it could be effected without material injury to the property. Under the English law the maxim adopted was 'quicquid plantatur solo cedit' (whatever is affixed to the soil becomes part of it), the rule being relaxed only in respect of certain kinds of tenant's fixtures and not generally.[1]

The strict rule of English law was never applied in this country.[2] In 'Thakoor Chunder Poramanick' v. 'Ramdhone Bhuttacharjee',[3] Sir Barnes Peacock observed as follows:

> "We think it clear that, according to the usages and customs of this country, buildings and other such improvements made on land do not, by the mere accident of their attachment to the soil, become the property of the owner of the soil; and we think it should be laid down as a general rule that, if he who makes the improvement is not a mere trespasser, but is in possession under any 'bona fide' title or claim of title, he is entitled either to remove the materials restoring the land of the state in which it was before the improvement was made, or to obtain compensation for the value of the building if it is allowed to remain for the benefit of the owner of the soil—the option of taking the building, or allowing the removal of the material, remaining with the owner of the land in those cases in which the building is not taken down by the builder during the continuance of any estate he may possess."[4]

There was a difference of opinion as to whether trees planted by the tenant could be removed by him.[5]

This clause enacts in substance the principles of the Roman Civil law as stated above and the pre-existing law of the land[6] as interpreted by the Full Bench in 'Poramanick's case'.[6a]

The clause must be read with clause (o) which provides that the lessee cannot fell or sell timber, pull down or damage buildings belonging to the lessor, and, when so read, it is clear that this clause will apply only to such things that the 'tenant himself' has attached to the land and not to other things. Thus, trees planted by the tenant or buildings erected by him or things attached to the earth by the tenant can be removed by the tenant under this clause, while trees already on the land, or spontaneously growing there even after the commencement of the tenancy, and building on the land cannot be removed by the tenant.[7]

It has been held in the undermentioned cases[8] that, in cases not governed by the Act, trees even planted by the tenant belong to the landlord and cannot be removed by the tenants, but the general trend of view is that trees planted by the tenant can, on the principle of this section, be removed by him.[9] (See also clause (o), Note 4.)

3. Time for removal. — Under the clause as it stood before the amendment of 1929, a tenant could remove the things he had attached to the earth only "during the continuance of the lease."[1] But notwithstanding this, it was held in some cases[2] that a tenant could, on equitable grounds, or on the ground of local usage, be granted a reasonable time for removing the fixtures even after the determination of the tenancy. This uncertainty regarding the tenant's right of removal has now been removed by the amendment of the clause, allowing the tenant a right to remove his fixtures so long as he is in possession of the property even though the tenancy has come to an end. If once the tenant quits possession, however, the fixtures become the property of the lessor. The tenant loses all right, title and interest in the structures[3] and cannot return and remove them.[4]

4. Right to compensation. — This clause does not say anything as to the rights of the parties if the tenant has handed over the property with the thing he has attached to the land. In 'Poramanick's case'[1] the observations of Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., lent some colour to the view that the lessor was liable to pay 'compensation' to the lessee for the things attached to the land which were taken over by him. It was consequently held, on the strength of the said case, that the tenant would be entitled to claim compensation from the lessor even after he had parted with the lease-hold interest after termination of the lease.[2] A contrary view has been held in a number of cases on the ground that a lessee who erects permanent structures or attaches other things to the earth, does so at his own risk and that his only right is to remove the things so attached and not claim compensation[3] or resist ejectment at the end of the term.[4] It is submitted that whatever might have been the view before the amendment, the clause, as amended, seems to make it clear that after delivery of possession to the lessor, the lessee cannot claim any compensation. Of course, if a structure had been erected by the tenant with the consent of the landlord or by his acquiescence, different considerations will apply and the lessee may be entitled to claim compensation.[5]

A well sunk by the tenant cannot be said to be a thing which he has attached to the earth and there is no question of any removal thereof.[1]

6. Void lease. — This clause does not apply in terms to a lease which is void. But the principle has been held applicable and the lessee who has erected a structure on the land has been held entitled to remove the same, but not to any compensation.[1]

7. Property acquired under the Land Acquisition Act. — Where the property leased was acquired before the expiry of the lease under the Land Acquisition Act and compensation was awarded for both the land and the thing attached thereto by the lessee, it was held that the tenant was entitled to a share in the compensation amount for the thing he had so attached.[1]

8. Contract to the contrary. — The right of a tenant to remove the thing he has attached to the demised property is subject to a contract[1] or local usage[2] to the contrary.. In South Kanara there is a usage that the tenant can either remove the structure erected by him on the land or claim compensation for the value thereof. This usage will prevail over the provisions of this Act.[3] A lease of certain buick fields stipulated for the forfeiture of the materials remaining on the demised promises on the expiring of the lease. After the expiring of the lease the landlord allowed certain time or a matter of grace to the lessee to remove his property. It was held that this did not amount on the part of the condition of the forfeiture.[4]

Synopsis

1. Scope.
2. "Uncertain duration."
3. Lessee in fault.

1. Scope. — Growing crops are, as has been seen in S. 3, not included in the definition of "immoveable property." They, however, constitute a legal incident of immovable property within the meaning of S. 8. It would follow from this that if a person is lawfully evicted from land he cannot lay claim to the growing crops on the land at the time of eviction. There are, however, some exceptions to the rule. Under S. 51 a transferee of immovable property who is evicted by a person having a better title is entitled, under certain circumstances, to crops planted or sown by him and growing at the time of eviction.

Under the Common law of England a tenant for an uncertain period has, under the name of 'emblements', the benefit of growing crops of such species as ordinarily repay the labour by which they are produced within the year in which that labour is bestowed.[1] In other words, a right is given, by law, in certain cases to the tenant of an estate of uncertain duration which has unexpectedly determined, without any fault of such tenant, to take the crops growing upon the land when his estate determines, although the estate itself has ceased.[2] This clause enacts in substance the principles of the Common law as stated above[3] and of what was also the Common law of India[4] and furnishes another exception to the general rule stated above. The right to growing crops involves, as an incident thereto, a right to free ingress and egress to gather and carry them.[5] A, the lessor, sued B, the lessee for possession. A decree was passed for possession on condition of A depositing a certain amount on a date specified. A failed to do so and B continued to be in possession and raised crops on the land; it was held by the High Court of Madras that B was entitled to the benefit of this clause and that A could not get the crops by subsequently depositing the amount.[6]

The principle of this clause will apply to agricultural leases. The principle has been held applicable to usufructuary mortgages of uncertain duration[7] and was applied in the undermentioned case[8] to a 'known' mortgage.

2. "Uncertain duration." — This clause will apply only to leases of uncertain duration. For example, a lease from year to year or from month to month or a lease in which the period is limited conditionally on the happenings of some event is a lease of uncertain duration.[1a] Where the tenant 'knows' when his term is to cease, he can have no equity in his favour and will not be entitled to the benefit of this rule.[1]

3. Lessee in fault. — The equity of the rule in this clause cannot obviously apply to cases where the determination of the tenancy is brought about by the lessee's own negligence or misconduct.[1] Thus, where the tenancy is determined by forfeiture under clause (g) of S. 111 the tenant cannot claim the benefit of this rule.[2] It has been held in England that where a tenancy is determined by the tenant's own act, such as by the marriage of a

1. Scope.
2. Absolute transfer.
3. Rights of assignee.
4. Liabilities of assignee.
5. Mortgage or sub-lease by lessee.
6. Lessee continues liable.
7. Rights of lessee against assignee or sub-lessee.
8. Last paragraph.
9. Agricultural leases.
10. Clause not retrospective.

1. Scope. — As has been seen in S. 6, Note 1, it is the general principle of law that property of any kind may be transferred except as provided by this Act or any other law for the time being in force. This general principle is applicable to lease-hold interest as well.[1] Even before the Act this general rule was followed in this country as to tenancies[1a] except in certain classes of tenancies which were held as non-transferable in the absence of a contract or custom to the contrary.[2] This clause merely enacts the pre-existing law[3] and applies to all kinds of leases governed by the Act.[4] The lessee is entitled, under this clause to transfer absolutely, or by way of mortgage or sub-lease, the whole, or any part of his interest in the property unless the right is clearly not transferable.[5] to question in view of the express recognition in S. 10 of conditions restraining alienation inserted in leases for the benefit of the lessor. (See S. 10, Note 13 and S. 111, Note 13.) Even where there is a proviso for re-entry, the lease does not 'ipso facto' cease to be operative unless the lessor exercises his option to forfeit it.[6] But the lessor can, when a transfer is made in contravention of the covenant against alienation, sue the lessee for damages[7] or, if the lessee threatens to make an alienation, for an injunction restraining the lessee from making it.[8]

Where the covenant is that the lessee should not alienate without the consent of the lessor it has been held that the consent cannot be withheld arbitrarily, unreasonably or vexatiously.[9]

A lessor contracting for a right of re-purchase of the lessee's right does not in any way derogate from the transferable quality of the lessee's right.[10]

A lessee cannot make a transfer to last beyond his own interest. The determination of the lease will put an end to the interests transferred by him.[11]

The mere fact that a lessee's interest is made transferable under this clause does not necessarily imply that every tenancy is also 'heritable'. For instance, a tenancy for life comes to an end at the death of the tenant and is not a heritable interest.[12]

2. Absolute transfer. — A lessee can transfer his interest absolutely, for example, by sale.[1] Such a transfer creates a 'privity of estate' between the lessor and the transferee, but not a 'privity of contract'.[2] The consequence of this is that the assignee is liable to the lessor for all the burdens of the lease, burdens which are imposed upon him by the mere assignment, whether he enters into possession or not,[3] but not for personal contracts of the lessee.[4]

3. Rights of assignee. — The assignee is entitled to the option of the lessee to purchase the leased property.[1] On the principles stated in Notes 1 and 25 on S. 40 the benefit of all covenants between th lessor and the lessee will run with the land if they touch and concern the land and will therefore pass to the assignee of the lessee's interest. In the case noted below[2] it was held that an assignee from the lessee, to whom possession had not been given by the lessor, could sue the lessor for damages for breach of the obligation.

Where the lease is terminable by a notice to quit, the lessor is not bound to give notice to quit to the assignee from the lessee and it is enough if such notice is given to the lessee (3).

4. Liabilities of assignee. — There is no provision in the Act dealing with the liability of the transferee of the lessee.[1] But, as has been seen already, the assignee will be liable to perform all the burdens of the lease by reason of the privity of estate that comes into existence between himself and the lessor.[2] Thus, a covenant to pay rent runs with the land and will be the unexpired residue of the term, by way of sub-lease does not operate as an assignment in this country and does not create any privity of estate or of contract between the lessor and the sub-lessee.[2] In this respect the English law is different. Under that law a sub-lease of the residue of the whole term operates as an assignment, if it be by deed.[3] In this country the mortgage, or the sub-lessee, therefore, is not liable to perform the covenants of the lease.[4] The contrary view that has been taken in some cases[5] is no longer good law in view of the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in 'Ramkinkar Banerjee' v. 'Satyacharan'[6] and 'Jagadamba Loan Co., Ltd.' v. 'Raja Siba Prasad'[7] that there is no privity of estate between the lessor and a transferee from the lessee of a 'partial interest' in the lease.

But though the transferee of a partial interest in the lease such as a mortgagee or a sub-lessee has no privity estate or of contract with the lessor and is not bound to perform, as such, the covenants in the lease, he may be liable under S. 40 on the 'restrictive' covenants, if any, in the head-lease if he had taken the transfer with the notice of such covenants.[8] In the case of a sub-lease it is well settled that the sub-lessee is deemed to have constructive notice of the covenants in the head-lease.[9] It has been held in the undermentioned case[10] that a mortgagee from the lessee who has taken the mortgage with notice of the covenant to pay rent can be sued by the lessor for relief under S. 27 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, and S. 91 of the Trusts Act, 1882.

6. Lessee continues liable. — The lessee does not, under this clause cease to be liable for the rent and for the performance of the other obligations of the lease.[1] The English law is also the same on the point.[2] The lessee cannot, by merely giving the lessor notice of transfer of the lease, get rid of his obligation to pay rent[3] and cannot plead in answer to a suit for rent that the transferee is willing to pay it.[4]

Where the lessor accepts rent from the assignee a privity of contract also will be created between the lessor and the assignee with the result that the lessee ceases to be liable for the rent.[5] Where there is, however, an express covenant to pay rent the lessee will not be absolved from payment under the covenant by reason merely of the fact that the lessor has received rent from the assignee.[6] Where rent is accepted from the assignee, not as a transferee from the lessee, but as an agent of the lessee, there is no recognition of the assignment by the lessor.[7]

Where there is no receipt of rent by the lessor from the assignee, the lessee and the assignee will both be liable on the covenants in the lease which run with the land. The lessee is, prior to the assignment, liable in a dual capacity, namely, privity of contract and privity of estate. By the assignment he divests himself of the latter capacity but retains the former. The result is that the lessor may avail himself of the relation that has come into existence between him and the assignee, as well as of the contractual relation that exists between him and the lessee. Thus, he has a remedy against them both, but can take out execution against one of them only.[8]

7. Rights of lessee against assignee or sub-lessee. — As between the lessee and his assignee the latter is primarily liable to perform the covenants in the lease, and will be deemed to have impliedly contracted to indemnify the lessee against the claims of the lessor for breach of the obligations imposed by virtue of the contract of lease.[1] But as seen in Note 4 the liability of the assignee to perform the covenant will cease by his assigning his interests to a second assignee, inasmuch as he is liable to the lessor only by virtue of privity of estate, and when that passes to the second assignee, his liability ceases.[2] Nevertheless, he will continue liable as to all breaches committed between the date of his taking the assignment and his transfer to the second assignee.[3] He would also continue liable on any express contract which he might have entered into with the lessee.[4] An 'under-lessee' is not liable to indemnify the lessee in respect of rent which the lessee has been compelled to pay to his lessor under his covenant to pay rent.[5]

8. Last paragraph. — This paragraph is identical in terms with clause (i) of S. 6. As seen in Note 37 on that section, occupancy tenancies have, by various Acts of the Legislature, been declared to be not transferable. An alienation of such tenancy would, in fact, have the effect of defeating the provisions of law. It is on this ground that such tenancies have been excepted from the operation of this clause. The clause will, therefore, not operate so as to enable a valid transfer being made of such tenancy.[1]

9. Agricultural leases. — This clause, in terms, does not apply to agricultural leases. But the principle underlying this clause will apply and every lessee can, under S. 6 of the Act, transfer his interest to another person unless otherwise provided by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force.[1] The lessee will continue liable notwithstanding the assignment to another.[2] Where the relationship of landlord and tenant with permanent occupancy right was not created by any contract of the parties it was held in the undermentioned case[3] that neither this clause nor the principle underlying it applied and that an occupancy tenant was not liable for rent after he had transferred his holding and had given notice of the transfer to his landlord.

10. Clause not retrospective. — This clause is not retrospective and does not apply to leases executed before the Act.[1] It will not make a tenancy which was not transferable before the Act, assignable subsequent to the Act.[2]

1. Scope. — This clause may be compared with S. 55, sub-s. (5) clause (a) which is worded in similar terms. See Note 13 on that section.

Section 108 Clause (l).

Synopsis

1. Scope
2. Interest on rent.
3. Rent not a charge.
4. Rent in kind.
5. Tender or payment at the proper time and place.
6. "To the lessor or his agent."
7. Payment must be by lessee.
8. Increase of rent.
9. Question of title.
10. Concurrent lease.
11. Covenant to pay rent runs with the land. See Note 25 on S. 40 and Note 4 on Clause (j).
12. Void lease.
13. Non-payment of rent.
14. Suspension, abatement and reduction of rent.

1. Scope. — A right to recover rent or the liability to pay rent involves the position that there exists a relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties.[1] Where there is no such relationship, no liability to pay rent

SECTION 108 CLAUSE (L) NOTE 1

1. ('07) 31 Bom 159 (161): 8 Bom LR 988 (DB), Manjappa Subaya v. Venkatesh Bab Prabhu. (Assignee of lessee who has himself assigned to another is not liable for rent as there is no privity of estate or contract between the lessor and the first assignee after his assignment.)
[See also ('28) 15 AIR 1928 Nag 147 (148): 113 Ind Cas 111, Ram Chandra v. Seth Bhawani Ram. (Mortgagee from lessee who has no privity of estate or contract with the lessor is not liable for rent, even if he has paid rent voluntarily to the landlord.)]

arises.[2] But so long as the relationship of landlord and tenant continues, the tenant will be liable for the rent.[3] The fact that the tenant was not in actual occupation of the demised property is not a valid defence to a claim by the landlord for the rent.[4] If the lease is a voidable one and is avoided, the obligation to pay rent will cease.[5]

The right to the rent is vested in the landlord and the tenant cannot contract with a third party to divest his landlord of that right.[6]

Where a lump rent is fixed for several estates leased out to a person, the landlord cannot split up or apportion it and claim a proportionate rent for a particular estate.[7]

The clause applies in terms only to cases where a "lease" as defined in S. 105 has been executed. But even if no such lease is actually executed, if there is a relationship of landlord and tenant established between the parties in point of fact, the landlord would, on general principles, be entitled to recover the rent due as a debt.[8]

2. Interest on rent. — The word "rent" will not include interest payable on arrears of rent, as the payment of interest can neither be said to be a "consideration" for the lease nor a payment "to be rendered periodically, or on specified occasions" within the meaning of S. 105.[1] If, therefore, a sum of money is paid by the lessee to the lessor as rent and is accepted by the lessor as such, he cannot apply it towards any interest that may be due on the arrears of rent.[2] But this does not mean that interest is not recoverable on the arrears of rent where there is a stipulation for such interest.[3] Interest can also be claimed as damages on the arrears of rent in the absence of a stipulation for interest.[4].

See also the undermentioned cases.[5]

3. Rent not a charge. — The rent or premium payable is not a charge on the leasehold premises.[1] Nor is it a charge on the crops raised by the tenant.[2] As to whether rent is a charge under local Tenancy Acts, see Note 12 on section 100.

4. Rent in kind. — Where rent is stipulated to be paid in kind the lessor cannot, on failure to pay such rent, claim interest either under the Interest Act, 1839, or as damages under S. 73 of the Contract Act. The Interest Act does not apply because rent in kind is not a "debt". Section 73 of the Contract Act will enable the award only of the value of the grain at the time it is due as 'damages' and not as interest.[1]

The fact that the lessor might have received in previous years the value in money for the rent in kind, fixed by the contract of lease, will not disable him from claiming the payment of rent in kind for any particular year.[2] As to the lessor's rights where the rent is fixed as payable in kind or partly in kind and partly in money and a value of the rent is kind is also mentioned in the lease, see Note 62 on section 105.

5. Tender or payment at the proper time and place. — A tender of rent must be of the exact sum due.[1] It is the duty of the lessee, where no place of payment is fixed by the contract, to apply to the lessor for a reasonable place being named for payment of the rent; where this is not done the lessee must make the payment at the place where the lessor is, on the principle that "the debtor must find his creditor".[2] The lessee may, however, prove a contract subsequent to the lease, that the rent should be paid at a particular place.[3] There is nothing in the clause to require the landlord to make a 'demand' for the rent. The lessee is bound to pay the rent without any demand.[4]

Where the lease stipulates that the rent should be paid at a particular time, the lessee is bound to pay it at the time so specified. Where no such time is specified in the deed the rent will become due at the close of the period in respect of which the rent is reserved, unless there is any usage to the contrary governing the case.[5] The contrary view taken in the undermentioned case[6] that the rent becomes due as soon as the lease is granted, though payable at a future date, is, it is submitted, not correct. The landlord is not bound to accept rent in advance. If he however accepts it he is bound to appropriate the advance in his hands towards the rent as and when it occurs due.[7]

6. "To the lessor or his agent." — A payment or tender of the rent must be made not only at the proper time and place, but must be made to the 'lessor or his agent in this behalf'.[1] A payment to a person directed by the lessor will be a payment to the lessor himself.[2] A payment of rent after the death of the lessor to a person who is not the heir is not binding on the real legal representative of the lessor.[3] Where the lessor is a 'benamidar' for another person, it has been held that a payment of the rent to the real owner by the lessee is a good discharge of his liability.[4]

It has been seen in Note 14 on S. 60 that a payment or tender to one of several co-creditors is not a valid discharge of the debt against all of them.

On this principle a payment of rent by the lessee to one of several co-lessors will not be a valid discharge of the debt against them all.[5] The contrary view taken in the undermentioned cases[6] cannot be considered, in view of the discussion in S. 60, Note 14, to be good law. In any view, a payment to one of several co-lessors, will not be a good discharge of the liability against them all if such payment is made fraudulently or collu-between the lessors and the lessee for collection of rent in separate shares does not preclude the lessors from together suing for the whole rent.[11] One of several lessors can also sue the lessee for apportionment of rent making all the other lessors parties to the suit.[12]

7. Payment must be by lessee. — A lessor cannot be compelled to accept payment of rent from a person who was not established to be his tenant.[1] Nor can the lessor claim rent from a person who is not his tenant. But a 'benamidar' for the lessee is in law the same person as the lessee himself and therefore the lessor can sue him for rent.[1a] Where A leases to B certain property and B happens to be one of several partners, there is a difference of opinion as to whether the lessor can sue the partners for rent. According to the Bombay High Court[2] he cannot, while according to the Madras High Court[3] he can. Where a lease is granted to several persons, each of the lessees is liable for the whole rent.[4] A suit is therefore maintainable against one of them for the whole rent.[5] The executor of a deceased lessee is not personally liable to pay the rent accruing due after the death of the lessee unless he enters into possession, in which case his position will be that of an assignee of the term.[6] In the undermentioned case[7] decided under the English law a lease was granted to A and B. A and B jointly and severaly covenanted to pay the rent and both of them paid rent in equals shows. On the death of A it was held that as the lease created a joint tenancy and as B succeeded to the whole benefit of the lease, the executors of A were not liable to contribute towards the payment of rent.

8. Increase of rent. — A lessor is not entitled to increased rent merely on the ground that the prevailing rent on other land in the vicinity is higher.[1]

Where a lease stipulates that, if the tenant continues after the expiry of the period fixed, he should pay an increased rent from that date, the stipulation is not a penalty and is valid.[2] If the tenant continues in spite of the notice he will be deemed to have agreed to pay the enhanced rent.[3] The same principle will apply where the lease contains a stipulation to pay a higher rent if the tenant fails to make certain payments at specified times.[4] The view taken in the undermentioned cases[5] that notwithstanding the stipulation to pay the increased rent, the lessor was not entitled to claim it, is, it is submitted, not correct.

A stipulation for enhanced rent, if the area of the demised property is found, on measurement, to exceed that mentioned in the lease, does not enable the lessee to an abatement of the rent if the area is found to be less.[6] If the area is in excess of that mentioned in the lease, the lessor will be entitled to rent for such excess area.[7].

A stipulation to pay higher rent by the tenant in certain events has been held to be enforceable even against a court auction-purchaser of the tenant's interests.[8]

9. Question of title. — The question of the lessor's title is wholly foreign to a suit for rent against the lessee inasmuch as the tenant is estopped from denying the title of the landlord.[1] A lessor can, therefore, recover rent from the lessee even though he may have no title to the land.[2] A lessee from one joint owner cannot set up the rights of the cosharers of his lessor and refuse to pay rent to his lessor.[3]

10. Concurrent lease. — Where A leases property to B for a period of years and then grants another lease to C which is to commence before the expiry of the prior lease, the lease in favour of C would be called "a concurrent lease". Such a lease operates as an assignment of a part of the reversion during the continuance of such previous lease, and thenceforth, as a lease in possession during the residue of the term therein expressed to be granted. The landlord, having thus assigned the reversion during the concurrent period, cannot sue the first lessee for rent but can claim rent from the second lessee who, in his turn, could recover from the first lessee.[1]

1. ('08) 30 All 369 (370): 5 All L Jour 423 (DB), Rama Anant Singh v. Shankar Singh.

11. Covenant to pay rent runs with the land. — See Note 25 on S. 40 and Note 4 on clause (j) of this section.

12. Void lease. — Where a lease is void there is no relationship of landlord and tenant created between the parties. The party in occupation under such a lease is not liable to pay any 'rent' to the owner of the property.[1] He will, however, be liable to the owner for damages for use and occupation.[2]

13. Non-payment of rent. — The non-payment of rent does not determine the tenancy or constitute adverse possession so long as the relation of landlord and tenant continues.[1] Where under the contract of lease, the lessee, in case of default of payment of rent, is liable to be evicted on three days' notice and is also liable to pay interest on the rent due, it has been held that the remedy of a suit for damages for breach of contract in case of default in the payment of rent, is also available to the lessor, although such remedy is not expressly stipulated for in the lease deed.[2]

14. Suspension, abatement and reduction of rent. — This clause does not say that if the lessor fails to put the lessee in possession or if, having put him in possession, the lessee is deprived of possession in whole or in part, the lessee is not bound to pay rent.[1] But the rule is well settled that non-delivery of possession or the failure to secure possession of the property in whole or in part is a good answer to suit for rent in respect of the property not delivered or secured and for the period the tenant is out of possession.[2] The basis of lessor rent for the portion in his enjoyment and from which he has received income.[5]

In England, the law, however, is different. A tenant who is not put in possession of a part of the demised property[6] or who, after being put in possession, is evicted from a part thereof by the lessor[7] is entitled to a suspension of the 'entire rent' for the period he is out of possession. The reason of this rule was originally connected with the feudal system which once prevailed in that country and is to the effect that no man may be encouraged to injure or disturb his tenant in his possession whom by the policy of the feudal law, he ought to protect and defend;[8] further that, "because of the demise every part of the land was equally chargeable with the whole rent, therefore, the lessor shall not, by his own act, discharge any part from the burden during the continuance of such contract."[9]

It has been held by the High Court of Madras that the doctrine of suspension as applicable in England, does not apply to this country, and that if the tenant continues in possession of a part of the property, he will be liable to an abated share of the rent.[10] The High Court of Allahabad and the Chief Court of Oudh also appear to be of the same opinion.[11]

The High Court of Calcutta has, however, applied the doctrine of suspension of rent not only to cases of eviction by the lessor of the lessee from a part of the demised property[12] but also to cases of non-delivery of possession

In some cases[15] it has been held that the English doctrine is not to be rigidly applied in this country, but should be applied only as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience, and in other cases[15a] that where possession of a part of the property is not given, but the tenant has taken possession of the other part, or acquiesced in the non-delivery by payment of rent, or the non-delivery was due to some 'bona fide' mistake, there should be an apportionment and not a suspension of rent.

It has further been held that the doctrine of suspension rests upon the facts that the tenure is an entire and indivisible one, the rent being fixed as a lump sum for the entire land,[16] and that, where the rent is separately assessed for separate parcels of the property demised, the doctrine is not applicable.[17] Before the decision of the Privy Council in 'Katyayani Devi' v.

'Udoy Kumar',[18] it was held that the fact that rent was fixed at so much per acre, did not prevent it from being an entire rent so long as the rent was equally chargeable on every part of the property.[19] In 'Katyayani Debi's case'[20] which was one of eviction by a paramount title, of the lessee from a part of the demised property their Lordships of the Privy Council observed:

> "The doctrine of suspension of payment of rent, where the tenant has not been put in possession of part of the subject leased, has been applied where the rent was a lump rent for the whole land leased treated as an indivisible subject. It has no application to a case where the stipulated rent is so much per acre or bigha."

This observation of their Lordships has given rise to a conflict of decisions. On the one hand, it has been held that, where rent is fixed at so much per bigha or acre, the doctrine of suspension has no application to the case.[21] On the other hand, the view has been taken that their Lordships' observations refer only to cases of non-delivery of possession and not to cases of eviction, and, provided there is an indivisibility of the tenure, the question of lump rent or a rental at so much per bigha is not relevant.[22] In a recent decision of the Privy Council [22a] a question arose as to suspension of rent in case of the lessor's failure to deliver possession of a part of the demised lands. The rent fixed was a lump sum and in a suit for rent by the lessor, the lessee raised the contention, nearly fifty years after the granting of the lease, that the failure of the lessor to deliver possession of a portion of the lands caused a suspension of the whole rent. The case was one from Bengal. In rejecting the contention and upholding the decision of the High Court holding that the landlord was entitled to apportionment of rent, the Privy Council reviewed exhaustively the trend of law in Bengal on this subject and laid down that in case of failure to deliver possession of a portion of the demised lands, the doctrine of suspension of rent should not be applied. Their Lordships expressly confined their decision to a case of failure to give possession and declined to express their view as to what would be the correct legal position in case of 'eviction'. In the course of their judgment their Lordships referred to the previous decision of the Board in 'Katyayani's case' and observed as follows as regards that case:

> "The observations of the Board in 52 I.A. 160 have only added to the perplexity since they have in some cases been wrongly taken to lay down that if the rent is a lumpsum rent, then in all cases of failure to give possession of any part, there must be a suspension of the entire rent.

They were intended only as showing that on its facts that case raised no question of suspension. . . . ."

The above decision clearly establishes that in Bengal at any rate, even where the rent is fixed as a lump sum for whole area leased, the doctrine of suspension of rent does not apply to cases of failure of the lessor to give possession of a part of the land leased.

In order to constitute an 'eviction' by the lessor for the application of the doctrine of suspension of rent, the act done by the lessor must be a 'wrongful' or 'tortious' act of dispossession.[23] It must not be a mere trespass but must be something of a grave and permanent character done with the intention of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the demised property.[24] Further, there must be a substantial interference with the enjoyment of the property, though actual physical expulsion is not necessary.[25] A 'bona fide' or innocent dispossession does not constitute an eviction by the lessor and is not a ground for a suspension of rent.[26]

Eviction by paramount title.

Eviction by paramount title is a good defence to a suit for rent.[27] But in order to constitute such an "eviction"—

(1) it must have been from something actually forming part of the demised premises,

(2) the party evicting must have a good title, and

(3) the tenant evicted must have quitted against his will.[28]

Forcible expulsion is, however, not necessary.[29] If, upon a claim being made by title paramount the lessee consents to an attornment to such person or to change the title under which he holds, or enters into a new arrangement for holding under him, this will be an eviction by paramount title.[30] The mere institution of a suit for possession[31] or the mere apprehension of eviction is not sufficient.[32]

Where the lessee is evicted by title paramount from the 'whole' of the property demised, there is no liability upon the lessee to pay any rent at all.[33] Where the eviction is from a 'part' of the demised premises, there will be an 'abatement' of the rent to the extent of the property lost to the lessee.[34] The doctrine of suspension does not apply to such cases.[35] In 'Imambandi Begam' v. 'Kamleshwari Pershad',[36] the lessor was unable to give possession to the lessee of a part of the demised property by reason of a third person with paramount title being in possession. Their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the lessee was in a position similar to that of a person who has been evicted from that part and that there was the same equity for apportionment as in the case of "eviction." The word "eviction" used by their Lordships must be taken to mean eviction by a paramount title and not by the lessor himself.

Diluvion.

Where the lessee is deprived of a part of the demised property by diluvion[37] or by earthquake[38] or other such similar causes there will be an 'abatement' of rent to the extent of the property lost to the lessee, unless there is a contract to the contrary.[39]

Acquisition under the Land Acquisition Act.

It has been held that where part of the demised property has been acquired under the Land Acquisition Act (1 of 1894) and the lessor has received compensation for the land acquired, he is bound to make an abatement of the rent.[40] But where the 'lessee' receives the whole of the compensation amount, he cannot claim any abatement of rent.[40a]

Trespasser.

An eviction by a trespasser is not a ground for abatement of rent.[41] The lessee must protect himself from illegal encroachment by others. If he fails to do so, this is no ground for prejudicing the landlord's claim for rent.[42] and there is no fraud or misreprsentation, the lease is not altogether void, but the lessee will be liable for the rent in proportion to the property of which he is given possession under the lease.[43]

Surrender by tenant.

Where the lessor accepts a surrender of a part of the land from his tenant, he cannot claim rent for that portion.[44]

Miscellaneous.

Where A usufructuarily mortgaged his land to B who leased it back to A, it was held that in a suit for rent by B, A was not entitled a reduction of rent on the ground that B did not advance the full amount of consideration shown in the mortgage document.[45]

The fact that the lessor has taken a lesser rent for some years than that actually due, will not disentitle him from claiming the rent at the stipulated rate.[46]

Where the leased property consists of certain villages identified by boundaries given and the rent fixed is not calculated with reference to the extent of lands at all, the lessee cannot claim any abatement of rent on the ground that the lessor failed to deliver possession of the total extent of lands mentioned in the lease deed.[47] Under a thick settlement of certain villages the dependant undertook to make collections from the tenants and to pay a fixed annual sum as rent to the plantiff. During the currency of the 'thick' the rents of tenants were reduced by the Rent Reduction Officer. It was held that the defendant was not entitled to a proportionate reduction in the absence of a term in his contract to that effect.[48]

Section 108 Clause (m).

Synopsis

1. Scope.
2. "Keep . . . in as good condition .....possession."
3. "Reasonable wear and tear."
4. Irresistible force.
5. Right of entry upon the property.
6. Notice.
7. Contract to the contrary.
8. Liability to third persons for damage caused as a result of non-repair.

1. Scope. — This clause refers to the liability of the lessee for what is known as "permissive waste" in English law. Clause (o) refers to his liability for what is known as "'voluntary' waste" in English law.[1] A waste which consists in permitting the demised property to become ruinous is called 'permissive' waste and a waste which consists in doing unauthorised acts which alter the character of the demised property is called 'voluntary' waste.[2] In the absence of an express covenant on the subject, the English law implies a covenant on the part of the lessee that he will use the buildings in a tenantable and proper manner and deliver up possession to the landlord at the termination of the tenancy in the same condition as demised, reasonable wear and tear excepted.[3]

This clause enacts, in substance, the above rule. While there is no general rule of law apart from contract or statute to compel the 'lessor' to repair the demised property, there is an implied obligation on the part of the tenant to keep the premises "wind and water-tight" and to make fair and tenantable repairs.[4] But the doctrine of permissive waste is to be applied under the rules of general common sense and goes no further than that a tenant is bound to take reasonable care of the property entrusted to him and see that through no neglect of his own it is irreparably damaged.[5]

2. "Keep.....in as good condition.....possession." — The tenant is bound to keep and restore the property to the lessor in as good condition as it was when he received it.[1] He is bound to preserve the boundaries of the land he holds as tenant and not to permit them to be destroyed. This is especially so, where he holds adjoining land of his own. If he does not do so he is bound to make good to the landlord the quantity of the land to which the latter is entitled.[2] Where a lessee entered into a covenant "to keep a house in good condition" it was held by Fletcher-Moulton, L. J., in 'Lurcott' v. 'Wakeley and Wheeler'[3] that the covenant involved an obligation on the part of the covenantor to do all that is necessary to maintain it as a habitable house and, if necessary, to put it in that condition, whether the means to that end consisted of repair or renewal, though the nature of the obligation would vary according to the age and character of the house.

In the undermentioned case[4] where a tenant covenanted to keep the premises "in as good repair and condition as the same are now in," it was held that the tenant would commit a breach of the covenant if he allowed the property to become infested with bugs.

The liability to keep the demised property in good condition continues throughout the period of tenancy. The tenant cannot claim that he is entitled to allow the property to be in a bad condition provided he effects the necessary repairs and restores it at the termination of the tenancy in as good a condition as it was when his tenancy began. The lessor is entitled to sue the tenant, even before the expiry of the tenancy, for relief for breach of the obligation to keep the property in good condition.[5]

3. "Reasonable wear and tear." — The obligation of the lessee to keep the demised property in as good condition as it was when he received it, is subject to the changes in the property caused by reasonable wear and tear. It will exclude dilapidation caused by friction of the air and dilapidations caused by exposure and by ordinary use.[1] In the undermentioned case[2] it was held by the Bombay High Court that if a wall of the leased premises collapsed for no fault of the lessee, he was not liable to the lessor in damages or to restore the building to its original state.

4. Irresistible force. — Fire is "irrestible force" within the meaning of this clause. But the lessee will be free from any liability only if it was not caused by his negligence. If he is responsible for the fire, he will be liable to the lessor.[1]

5. Right of entry upon the property. —In England, under the Common law, a landlord has no right to enter upon the demised premises for any purpose whatsoever. As a general rule, however, a covenant for a right of entry for the purpose of viewing the state of repair is inserted in the lease.[1] This clause gives a statutory right to the lessor to that effect.

6. Notice. — Where the lessor gives the required notice under this clause but the lessee, in answer, repudiates his liability to pay damages, the lessor is not bound to wait till the expiry of the three months before instituting a suit for relief. The tenant, by his repudiation, must be taken to have waived his right to the period of three months.[1]

7. Contract to the contrary. — This clause is, like the other clauses of the section, subject to a 'contract to the contrary' between the parties fixing their own terms and making their own bargains.[1]

8. Liability to third persons for damage caused as a result of non-repair. — See Woodfall, 'Landlord and Tenant', 22nd Edn., page 910 and the undermentioned case.[1]

Section 108 Clause (n).

1. Scope. — It is the duty of every lessee to protect his lessor's property from encroachment or unlawful eviction. If he fails to do so he exposes himself to an action for damages by his landlord.[1] The clause merely reproduces the law existing prior to the Act, namely, that a tenant on whose land there is an encroachment must give such notice to the landlord as would enable him to defend his right.[2] It will be noticed that the 'lessor' does not owe any duty to the lessee to protect him from legal proceedings or trespasses which would interfere with his possession, though he is under a duty under cl. (c) to secure the lessee in his possession without interruption by the lessor himself or by persons with paramount title. This clause throws the duty upon the 'lessee' to give notice to the lessor of legal proceedings to recover the property or of encroachment upon the lessor's right, in order that the lessor may, if he so chooses, protect his own interests and may be safeguarded against the results of a collusive eviction submitted to by the lessee.[3]

The encroachment or interference, in respect of which the tenant is bound to give notice, is an encroachment upon or interference with the 'lessor's rights' concerning such property. If, for instance, a stranger enters upon the land and destroys trees and buildings on the land, this will be an encroachment upon or interference with the lessor's rights. But a mere trespass on the land leased without any damage to the property is only an interference with the lessee's rights and not with the lessor's rights so as to oblige the lessee to give notice to the lessor under this clause. The reason is that the possession of such a trespasser is not adverse to the landlord[4] who is not bound to sue the trespasser for possession. But if the trespass is such that it interferes with the lessor's right to recover rent, it will be an interference in respect of which the lessee will be bound to give notice under this clause.[5]

1. Scope. — In England a tenant, whether from year to year of for a term of years or for life, cannot commit what is known as a 'voluntary' waste, i.e., any unauthorised act which alters the character of the land or destroys the land such as cutting down timber, opening or working mines, ploughing up pasture land, pulling down buildings, etc.,[1] or which does a lasting damage to the demised property.[2] This clause enacts, in substance, the said principle of English law and further provides that the lessee may use the property as a person of ordinary prudence would use it if it were his own but that he should not use or permit another to use it for a purpose other than that for which it was leased.

2. Reasonable user of demised property. — The lessee is bound to manage the leasehold property in a proper and efficient manner.[1] Where he uses the property in a reasonable and tenant-like manner he is not liable to the lessor for any damage that may be caused to the property by such user.[2] Thus, where a warehouse was let to the lessee for storing goods, and the lessee stored his goods not unreasonably, but the floor gave way by the weight of the goods, it was held that the lessee was not liable for the damage.[3] It has been held that a tenant cannot be said to make a reasonable use of the land leased if he collects the surface stones on the land and sells the same.[4]

3. User for purposes other than those for which the property is leased. — A tenant must use the property only for the purpose for which it is granted.[1] The words "for a purpose other than that for which it was leased" mean acts inconsistent with the purpose of the lease. The following are instances of such acts:

The following are the illustrations of cases in which the user was held not to be inconsistent with the purpose of the lease.

'Illustrations.'

(1) Where a lease of a land was given for winning oil by sinking wells and the lessee, finding that oil could not be got in commercial quantities, made use of the gas that came out of the wells, it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the use of the gas, set free by the wells, was not necessarily inconsistent with the purpose of the lease.[5]

(2) The conversion, by a permanent tenant, of a wet land, used for paddy and raggi cultivation, into a cocoanut garden was held not to be a conversion of the land for a purpose different from that for which it was let.[6] It was observed in that case that what shall be considered in farming as a good and husband-like user must vary according to the nature of the soil, its situation, and the climate.

(3) In 'Harrymohun Misser' v. 'Surendra Narain Singh',[7] where the leased land was used for indigo cultivation and a factory was erected thereon, it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the question whether the user will render the land unfit for the purpose of the tenancy will depend upon the size of the holding, area withdrawn from actual cultivation, and the effect of such withdrawl upon the fitness of the holding taken as a whole for profitable cultivation.

bringing it under cultivation and the lease contains no reservation, it has been held that the tenant has a right to cut and take the trees for himself.[4] The reason is that a contract to that effect must be implied in such cases. The principles stated above apply equally to trees growing spontaneously on the land during the period of the lease.[5] A tenant, however, will be entitled to prevent the growth of any trees which were not growing at the time of the commencement of his tenancy, and the growth of which would interfere with the purpose for which the land was let to him.[5a]

See also clause (h), Note 2.

The lessor or the landlord cannot interfere with the tenant's enjoyment of the trees during the period of the tenancy.[6]

This clause prohibits the felling or selling of 'timber' belonging to the lessor by the lessee. As has been seen in Notes on S. 3, the word "timber" is used to denote trees intended to be cut and used in the building and repairing of houses and for industrial purposes. The fact that the section refers to 'timber' only does not mean that the lessee can cut other trees belonging to the lessor. The cutting of such trees would clearly be "an act which is destructive or permanently injurious" to the property leased. The reason why the clause refers expressly to timber appears to be to avoid a possible view being taken that timber being trees which are intended to be cut and sold, the felling thereof would not be an act destructive or injurious to the property leased.

5. "Belonging to the lessor." — It has been seen in the Notes on clause (h) that the lessee may remove all things which 'he' had attached to the earth and can consequently cut away the trees planted by him and remove the buildings erected by him. Under this clause as it stood before the amendment of 1929, the lessee was prohibited from felling timber or pulling down or damaging buildings, without any distinction being made between timber or buildings belonging to the lessor, and those which the lessee himself had attached to the earth. But obviously, in view of clause (h) the prohibition extended only to trees and buildings which belonged to the lessor and not to the lessee. The amendment of this clause by the addition of the words "belonging to the lessor" makes this position now clear.

mines and minerals remains in the proprietor of the soil.[2] A lessee therefore cannot work new mines in the land leased out to him.[3] Where the right to minerals is, however, expressly granted to the lessee, the right to work mines is also impliedly granted thereby.[4]

7. "Any other act which is destructive," etc. — A tenant cannot alter the land in such a way as to permanently injure the interests of the landlord.[1] The felling of timber, the pulling down or damaging of buildings, the working of mines and quarries, are all illustrations of acts which are destructive or permanently injurious to the leased property. An excavation of agricultural land for the purpose of making bricks will be injurious to the property and a tenant cannot make such excavations in the absence of a provision in the lease to that effect.[2] Even if there is such a provision in the lease it has been held in the undermentioned case[3] that the terms cannot be construed as giving the lessee a right to make such excavations as would cause the complete destruction of the property. But in the case noted below[3a] where a tenant having a permanent and heritable right at a fixed rent in a large tract of land, made a small excavation in an area of a few square feet for the purpose of making bricks, it was held that the act was not detrimental to the land and that the tenant's right of enjoyment extended to making such excavations.

The construction of a well upon an agricultural holding is not a destructive or a permanently injurious act.[4] Nor is the use of an agricultural land temporarily for a theatrical company, where there are no crops on the land, destructive or injurious to the land.[5] A transfer by way of usufructuary mortgage is also not an act which can be said to injure the property.[6] An act cannot be said to be detrimental to the land unless it injures the land itself.[7]

8. Effect of breach of obligation. — A breach of the obligation under this clause does not necessarily entail a forfeiture of the lease. But the lessor would be entitled to claim damages for such breach[1] or, in the case of a threatened breach, for an injunction restraining the tenant from committing such breach.[2] He cannot on his own responsibility evict the tenant or induct any other person on the land.[3]

Section 108 Clause (p).

1. Scope. — Under the English law, there is no prohibition against a tenant erecting permanent structures on the land which do not cause damage to the land but which really improve it.[1] This clause departs from the English law in this respect. A lessee cannot erect any permanent structure on the land for non-agricultural purposes.[1a] The lessee of a building cannot even add a structure to it, for it might have wholly different effects from what was contemplated when the lease was given.[2] But where a house on the premises, not used for agricultural purposes, falls into disrepair, the tenant has been held entitled to rebuild and repair that portion.[3]

The clause excepts buildings for 'agricultural purposes'. Thus, a tenant can erect a dwelling house on the land for the purpose of facilitating his agricultural work.[4] An agriculturist tenant can also erect a walled enclosure on the land and build a cattle-shed, as they are for agricultural purposes.[5]

In the case of 'agricultural' leases to which the provisions of this Act are not applicable, it has been held that the English law should be applied as to the right of the tenant to erect buildings, and that a tenant with a permanent right of occupancy cannot be prevented from erecting permanent structures on the land[6] unless such an erection will cause permanent damage or injury to the property.[7]

Where the land is let for 'building purposes' this clause will not apply inasmuch as there must in such a case be deemed to be a covenant of the lessor, for such building.[8]

Where a tenant erects a permanent structure on the land for non-agricultural purposes, the lessor cannot on that ground eject him; he can, however, claim that it should be demolished.[9] It has been held by the High Court of Patna[10] that one of several lessors cannot enforce the obligation under this clause and ask for the demolition of the building erected, where the other co-lessors are not willing to enforce it.

As to the applicability of the doctrine of acquiescence and the doctrine of expectation to those cases in which the lessee erects a permanent structure and the lessor abstains from interfering, see S. 51 Notes 22 to 25 clause (h) Note 4.

Section 108 Clause (q).

1. Scope. — This clause enacts the well settled rule that the tenant must, on the expiration or sooner determination of his tenancy, deliver up to his landlord possession of the demised property.[1] The tenant cannot refuse to give up such possession on the ground that the landlord has no title,[2] unless subsequent to the lease there is an ouster of the landlord's right by a paramount title.[3] Nor can he refuse to give up possession on the ground that at some time during the period of his lease he was disturbed for a few days in for damages for wrongful occupation,[11] but not for rent.[12]

Where a lessee surrenders his tenancy by notice to the landlords, followed by delivery of possession to 'one' of them, the others cannot sue the tenant either for rent or for damages for use and occupation.[13] Nor is the lessee liable for rent or for use and occupation if he has offered to deliver possession but the lessor has refused to take it.[14]

Where land is leased to several lessees jointly 'all' the lessees must vacate at the determination of the tenancy. If some of them alone vacate, this will not relieve them of liability so long as any one or some of them remains or remain in occupation.[15]

The clause is subject to a contract to the contrary. Where it is expressly provided in the lease that the lessee need not deliver posssion at the expiry of the lease, he is not under any obligation to put the lessor in possession.[16]

In the undermentioned case[17] the lessee was to construct a cinema hall on the land demised and was entitled to be paid the price of it before he surrendered possession either on the expiry of the lease or at any other future time. It was held by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee that the lessee was entitled to remain in possession as tenant at the rent reserved by the lease until payment of the market price and could not be treated as trespasser liable to account for mesne-profits.

2. Special legislation : — Owing to the increase of population in the cities during the last Great War it was found necessary to give special protection to the tenants against enhancement of rent and ejectment by the landlords and hence there had been emergency legislation during the war period, superseding the rights and liabilities under the Transfer of Property Act. The emergency continues even after the Great War and with it the emergency legislation too. A few important cases decided under the emer-

109. If the lessor transfers the property leased, or any part thereof, or any part of his interest therein, the transferee, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, shall possess all the rights, and, if the lessee so elects, be subject to all liabilities of the lessor as to the property or part transferred so long as he is the owner of it ; but the lessor shall not, by reason only of such transfer, cease to be subject to any of the liabilities imposed upon him by the lease, unless the lessee elects to treat the transferee as the person liable to him :

Rights of lessor's transferee.

Provided that the transferee is not entitled to arrears of rent due before the transfer, and that, if the lessee, not having reason to believe that such transfer has been made, pays rent to the lessor, the lessee shall not be liable to pay such rent over again to the transferee.

The lessor, the transferee and the lessee may determine what proportion of the premium or rent reserved by the lease is payable in respect of the part so transferred, and, in case they disagree, such determination may be made by any Court having jurisdiction to entertain a suit for the possession of the property leased.

Analogous law.—The section may be compared with sections 140, 141, 142 and 151 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V, C. 20). Provisions similar to the second paragraph of the section have been enacted in the various local Tenancy Acts.[1]

2. Scope of the section.—The general principle is that rights and liabilities attached to property i. e., arising out of the possession and contral of property will pass with the property.[1] Qui in jus dominiumve alterius succedit jure ejus uti debet.[2] Thus, the transferee of the wreck of a vessel which was sunk by accident in a public navigable river would be under same duty as the transferor himself, to take precautions to prevent injury to other vessels by their striking against it.[3]

On the other hand, the general rule as to rights and liabilities, not attached to property but arising out of some personal relationship of the transferor, whether contractual or otherwise, with third parties, is that a person can transfer his rights but not his obligations.[3a] If the obligations are inseparable from the rights he cannot transfer even his rights. "A man cannot assign," said Innes, J., in Cherukomen v. Ismala,[4] "obligations (i. e., cannot substitute some one else as the performer of his duties) without the consent or authority of those to whom the duties are owing; and whereas, in the present case, rights are co-existent with and inseparable from obligations, so that the assignment of the one cannot be effected without the assignment of the other, there can be no valid transfer of rights without the consent and authority of those interested in the performance of the obligations."

This is the principle on which this section is based. The rights and liabilities referred to arise out of the contractual relationship of the transferor with his lessee, and the section provides that the rights of the transferor as to the property will pass[4a] but not the liabilities unless the lessee elects to hold the transferee liable.

Under the English law, however, transfers of leased property have been regarded as an exception to the principle last mentioned, in that such a transfer passes to the transferee all the rights and liabilities of the transferor with reference to the subject matter of the lease.[5]

This section, in terms, does not apply to transfers by operation of law.[6] But the principle underlying it is applicable to such cases.[7]

The section does not, by virtue of the provisions of S. 117, apply to a transfer of property which has been leased out for agricultural purposes. But even in such cases, the principle underlying the section is applicable.[8]

8. ('06) 29 Mad 29 (35, 36) (DB), Appa Rao v. Prattipati Ramayya.

This section may be compared with S. 37. The latter deals with transfers of all kinds of property and is not limited, as this section is, to transfers of property which has been leased. Further, it deals with the performance by a third person of obligations relating to the property transferred, on a severance of such property into several shares, and not, as this section does, with the performance by the transferor or his transferee of obligations relating to the property.

3. "Transfers the property."—As to what is "transfer of property" the meaning of this Act, see generally Notes on S. 5.

An agreement to transfer property is not a "transfer of property" and the contractee has no right to the property until the transfer is actually effected, and cannot claim the benefit of this section.[1]

The section assumes that there has been a valid transfer of property.[2]

4. "The property leased or any part thereof or any part of the interest therein."—It is not necessary for the section to apply that the entire property leased should have been transferred. The transfer may be of a part of such property of a part of the lessor's interest in such property. Thus, the section will apply to a transfer of two acres out of ten acres of leased property, or to a mortgage of the leased property[1] or even to a lease of the reversion.[2]

Illustrations.

(1) A, the owner of property leases the property to B, and thereafter usufructuarily mortgages it to C. A cannot after the mortgage accept any surrender from the lessee or enforce a forfeiture clause against him; for, such right will pass to C.[3]

(2) A, the owner of property, executes a lease thereof to B, and subsequently, before the expiry of such lease, executes another lease of the same property in favour of C. A cannot, after the date of the second lease, give B any notice to quit[4] or recover any rent due after the date of the second lease from B.[5] C will be entitled to those rights.

5. "All the rights ..... of the lessor as to the property or part transferred."—The transferee under this section gets all the rights of the transferor as to the property or part transferred. Thus, where the entire property is transferred the transferee can sue to eject the tenant on the basis that the tenancy has terminated[1] or on the basis of a forfeiture for breach of condition[2] which, as has been seen in Note 5 on S. 10 is a quality annexed to the estate. He can also continue the suit instituted by the lessor in connection with the property leased.[3]

Where part of the property is transferred the transferee gets all the rights of the transferor as to the part trnasferred. So far as the right of ejectment is concerned, the lessor himself has no right to sue to eject his tenant from a part of his holding[4] and consequently this section would not enable the transferee of a part to eject the tenant from such part. But under the general law, independent of this section, an assignment of a part of a holding effects a severance of the holding and entitles the transferee to eject the tenant from the land covered by the assignment.[5] A right under a covenant running with the land is one "as to the property" transferred and will therefore pass to the transferee under this section.[6] A privity of estate arises in such cases between the lessee and the lessor's assignee, even though there is no contract between them.[7] A covenant to pay rent[8] or to repair[9] is one running with the land and the assignee is therefore entitled to enforce such right. Where in a lease of certain premises the lessee covenanted, inter alia, that S should not be concerned in the conduct of the business carried on on the demised premises, and there was a clause for re-entry and determination of the lease on breach of covenant, it was held that the covenant was one running with the land as touching and concerning the thing demised and the assignee of the reversion was entitled to enforce it against the assignee of the lessee.[9a]

A purely personal right of the lessor against the lessee under a contract cannot be said to be a right "as to the property" and therefore will not pass to the transferee.[10]

As to covenants running with the land, see Notes on section 40.

6. "If the lessee so elects, be subject to all the liabilities."—An assignee of property will under this section, be subject to the liabilities of the transferor as to the property only if the lessee so elects it. This is in accordance with the principle referred to in Note 2 that a man cannot assign his obiigations without the consent or authority of those to whom the duties are owing.

But once the lessee does make his election in would be final. He cannot thereafter turn round and charge the original lessor in respect of his liabilities.[1]

7. Notice.—It is not incumbent either on the transferor or on the transferee to give the lessee notice of the tranfer. The section provides no penalty for want of such notice except the loss of rent which might be paid by the lessee to the original lessor in ignorance of the transfer.[1] But where the lessee knows that his original lessor has transferred his interests to another his paying rent to the original lessor is not valid. It is immaterial from whom the lessee receives such notice. The essential thing is that the transfer is brought to his knowledge.[2]

No attornment is necessary under this Act.[3] In the undermentioned case,[4] decided before the Act, it was held that attornment was necessary.

8. Rent paid in advance.—See Notes on Section 50.

9. Arrears of rent.—A transferee is not entitled to arrears of rent due before the date of the transfer. Under the English law rent in arrears is no part of the reversion but is a mere chose in action and therefore does not pass with the transfer of the reversion.[1] But such may be specifically contracted to be transferred to the assignee and in such a case the latter would be entitled to it, not, however, by virtue of the transfer of the property, but by virtue of the contract.[2] In the undermentioned case[3] A transferred to B his property "together with the arrears of past years' due" by the tenants of such property. It was held that the words "arrears of past years' due" did not pass to the purchases decree for arrears of rent held by the vendors.

10. Apportionment of rent.—The lessor cannot by his transfer increase the burden of the obligations of the lessee under his lease. An apportionment of the rent made by the lessor and his transferee without the consent of the lessee is, according to the English law, not binding on the latter.[1] In the absence of such consent, it can be done only through Court. This view was followed in this country also before the Act was passed.[2] The last paragraph of the section has given legislative effect to this view.

Where the lessor, the transferee and the lessee have agreed as to the amount of rent payable to the transferee, the lessor or the transferee can sue for the rent payable to him without impleadig the other.[3]

Although there is no express provision in the Act for apportionment of rent payable by the assignee of a portion of the land from the lessee, the principle of apportionment of rent contained in the last paragraph of this section can be applied in such a case.[4]

110. Where the time limited by a lease of immovable property is expressed as commencing from a particular day, in computing that time such day shall be excluded. Where no day of commencement is named, the time so limited begins from the making of the lease.

Exclusion of day on which commences.

Where the time so limited is a year or a number of years, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, the lease shall last during the whole anniversary of the day from which such time commences.

Duration of lease for year.

Where the time so limited is expressed to be terminable before its expiration, and the lease omits to mention at whose option it is so terminable, the lessee, and not the lessor, shall have such option.

Option to determine lease.

3. Second paragraph.
4. Third paragraph.

1a. Oral lease — Applicability of the section.—In the undermentioned case,[1] Rau, J., of the Calcutta High Court expressed the view that this section applied whether the lease was a written or oral one. But in the same case, Mukherjea, J., expressed a contrary view, viz., that the section only applied to written leases. The view expressed by Rau, J., has been approved in a later decision of the same High Court.[2] But where the oral lease is invalid as being for a period exceeding one year and a tenancy from month to month is held to arise by implication under S. 106, the invalid oral lease cannot be relied upon for saying that the time limited by the lease was expressed as commencing from a particular day.[3]

1. Commencement of lease.—The first paragraph of the section deals with the date of commencement of a lease. The word "from" as a general rule excludes the day from which the time is to be reckoned except where the context requires a contrary rule to be adopted.[1] This general rule is applicable whenever time is to be computed from a day specified, whether such time is fixed for the performance of a contract or is prescribed by law for the doing of an act or for the institution of proceedings in a Court of law. This principle is found embodied in S. 9 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, and S. 12 of the Limitation Act, 1908. Section 9, sub-s. (1) of the General Clauses Act runs as follows :

> "In any Central Act or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, it shall be sufficient, for the purpose of excluding the first in a series of days or any other period of time, to use the word "from," and, for the purpose of including the last in a series of days or any other period of time, to use the word 'to'."

And section 12, sub-s. (1) of the Limitation Act runs as follows :

> "In computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit, appeal or application, the day from which such period is to be reckoned shall be excluded."

The first sentence of the first paragraph of this section is an application of the said general principle to contracts of lease. It contemplates that a time or period should be limited by the lease[1b] and the period must be expressed to commence "from" a particular date. When both these conditions are satisfied the rule of interpretation laid down in the paragraph applies[1a] and in computing the period that day is to be excluded.[2] Where a lease of certain premises dated 29th June 1921 was expressed to be "from 1st June 1921 for the term of four years" it was accordingly held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the 1st June should be excluded in computing the period of four years.[3] Where a lease deed-demised certain premises "for the term of five years computed from the first day of December 1924," it was held that the word "computed" must be regarded as having the same meaning as the word "beginning" and that the lease must be regarded, for the purposes of the first paragraph of the section, as a lease expressed to begin "from" a certain day.[4] A lease expressed to be "from henceforth" is a lease from the day of its execution.[5]

Where no day of commencement is named in the lease, the section provides that the time limited begins from the making of the lease[5a] and this principal has been applied even to agricultural leases[6] to which the section in terms does not apply. It has been held in the undermentioned cases[7] that even in cases where no day for commencement of the lease is named, it may commence on another day, if the intention of the parties implied from the circumstances, is to make the lease commence on that day. This view does not give full effect to the words "expressed" and "named" used in the section and, it is submitted, is not correct. Thus, where a tenancy from month to month arises by implication under S. 106 and there is no express contract of tenancy, the date on which the tenant entered into possession cannot be treated as the date from which the lease is "expressed" to commence.[7a]

Where there is no evidence as to when the lease was granted and when it was intended to commence, the presumption will be that the tenancy expires on the last day of each month.[8]

It has been held that this paragraph is not applicable to a periodical tenancy such as a tenancy from year to year or from month to month as under such a tenancy time is limited by the notice to quit and not by the lease.[9]

2. "Particular day."—The particular day from which a lease commences to run may be prior to, the same as, or subsequent to, the day on which the lease is effected. In the Privy Council decision of Benoy Krishna Das v. Salsiccioni[1] the lease deed of certain premises dated 29th June 1921 provided that lease was to be "from 1st June 1921 for the term of four years." In the undermentioned cases[2] the lease was expressed to commence some time after the date of the lease deed.

Where a lease deed was executed on a particular date providing for the commencement of the lease from a prior date, it was held in Shaw v. Kay[3] that the tenant is not liable for acts done after the commencement of the term but before the time of the execution of the lease deed inasmuch as the habendum of lease merely expressed the duration of the tenant's interest, the operation as a grant being merely prospective.

3. Second paragraph.—In order that this part of the section may be applicable, two conditions must be fulfilled. The time limited by the lease must be a year, or a number of years, and there must be no express agreement to the contrary.[1] Where there is an express agreement to the contrary the terms of the agreement prevail.[2] Where a lease was expressed to be for four years commencing from the first days of June 1921 but the rent for each month was payable before the 7th of the next month, it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that this was not "an express agreement to the contrary" as contemplated in this section; and that, therefore, the lease lasted up to the midnight of the 1st day of June 1925.[3] See also the undermentioned cases.[4]

The second paragraph is merely a consequence of the first paragraph, and as was pointed out by Ameer Ali, J., in the undermentioned case,[5] is somewhat redundant. He said:

> "The effect of it, in my opinion, is merely to attempt to render certain what in England would have been a subject-matter of some doubt, and to lay down the artificial rule of construction that where a lease or any document is said to commence from a certain date, it means from the end of that date, and will have another day added on at the end. In other words, the end of the 1st December (as in this case) 1924 to the end of 1st December 1929."

Where the time limited is a month or week or a number of months or weeks the same principle, it is conceived, will apply, though the second paragraph refers only to leases for a year or a number of years. Where a tenancy for four weeks began "from Monday, the 8th March 1920," it was held in the undermentioned case[6] that the lease was up to the midnight of the fourth Monday from the 8th March 1920.

4. Third paragraph.—The rule in this paragraph is based on the general principal that a lease is to be interpreted, as far as possible in favour of a lessee rather than in favour of a lessor. Thus, where a house was leased "for 7, 14, or 21 years" it was held that it was the lessee who could choose the term of the tenancy from the three periods mentioned.[1]

Where a lease mentions the person who should exercise the option, the terms of the lease, of course, will prevail.[2] Where a lease was made for "21 years, determinable, nevertheless, at the expiration of seven or fourteen years, if the said parties thereto shall so think fit," it was held that the lease would terminate before 21 years only if both the parties consented to its termination before that date.[3]

Illustration to clause (f).

A lessee accepts from his lessor a new lease of the property leased, to take effect during the continuance of the existing lease. This is an implied surrender of the former lease, and such lease determines thereupon.

1. Scope of the section.—Section 110 deals with the commencement and duration of a lease. This section deals with the determination of leases. It applies only to leases created by act of parties and does not apply, for instance, to a lease created by devise.[1] Nor does it apply in terms to agricultural leases which are exempted from its operation by S. 117,[2] or to leases executed before the Act was passed,[3] or to leases executed in Provinces to which the Act is not extended.[4] In such cases, the principles on which the section is based have generally been applied as being in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience.

So long as a tenancy is not determined in one of the ways known to law, a tenant cannot be ejected as a trespasser[5] and a suit on title does not lie against him.[6]

The determination of a lease determines also, with one exception, all interests derived from the lessee.[7] The exception is a determination by surrender. A surrender does not, as will be seen in Note 8, affect the rights of a third person who has derived them from the lessee. So far as such person is concerned, the lease is regarded in law as continuing for his benefit.

A lease for term is not determined merely by the lessor unlawfully entering on the leased property before the expiry of the term. Such entry may give the lessee other remedies. (See S. 108, cl. (c), Note 8) ; but will not put an end to the lease.[8]

2. Clause (a)—Determination by efflux of time.—The question of the determination of a tenancy by efflux of time will arise only in those cases where the lease is for a fixed period.[1a] No such question can arise, for instance, in the case of a perpetual lease ; nor can it arise in a lease from year to year, for, as has been seen in the notes on S. 107, such a tenancy does not terminate at the end of each year, though it is terminable by a notice to quit at the end of any year.[1]

A lease for a term of years prima facie implies that the lessee's right to the property demised ends with the term.[2] It does not prima facie import any right of renewal.[3] No further act either by the lessee such as a notice to quit[4] is necessary to determine the lease.

Where, however, such a lease provides expressly that after the expiry of the term the tenancy is terminable by a notice, the lease is not determined until such notice, as has been agreed upon, is given.[5]

3. Renewal of lease.—A covenant for renewal in a lease will, as a general rule, be construed as a covenant for a single renewal and as a perpetual renewal.[1] The reason is that the leaning of the Courts is against perpetual renewals and, therefore, in order to establish this construction the intention should be unequivocally expressed in the lease deed.[2] Where, however, there are clear expressions indicative of such an intention, Courts would give effect to it. Thus, where a covenant for renewal states that the renewal was to be on the same covenants, "including this covenant" the covenant will be held to be one for perpetual renewal.[3]

Where a lessee has an option to ask for a renewal but does not ask for it before the expiry of the term and merely continues in possession he becomes merely a tenant from year to year after the termination of the original tenancy.[4] But the right to exercise the option and ask for a renewal does not necessarily cease with the expiry of the term. If the covenant itself requires the lessee to exercise his option before the expiry of the term he will lose his right if he does not exercise it within time.[5] But if there is no such restriction, he can, as long as he continues as a tenant (though as one from year to year) exercise his option and call upon the lessor to renew it. Thus, where a lease is for 3 years with an agreement to grant a further lease for 5, 7, 14 or 21 years, the lessee will be entitled, even after the expiry of the 3 years and while continuing in possession as a tenant from year to year, to call upon the lessor to renew the lease for 5, 7, 14 or 21 years.[6] But the lessor may, at any time, call upon the lessee to exercise his option and may, in default, determine the lease.[7]

A covenant for renewal which the lessee can claim only on the performance of certain conditions precedent, such as regular payment of rent, cannot be enforced by the lessee unless such conditions are performed.[8]

Where the option for renewal does not state the terms of the renewal, the general rule is that the new lease would be for the same period and on the same terms as the original lease in respect of all essential conditions except as to the covenant for renewal itself.[9]

But a covenant in a lease relating to renewal, according to which the renewal which might be made was entirely subject to the pleasure of the lessor, has been held not in essence a covenant for renewal with the lessee. That being so, in such a case, there can be no question that the new lease should be for a period similar to that for which the original lease was granted.[9a]

A covenant "that the lease shall, and may, be renewed" under certain circumstances means the lease as a whole. Where, before the expiry of the original lease, the lessee parted with a portion of his interest in favour of a third person, it was held that he could not claim a renewal of the lease in respect of the portion in his hands.[10]

A covenant for renewal in a lease by a Hindu widow having only a limited estate has been held to be not binding on the estate after her death.[11]

As to whether a covenant for renewal is one that "runs with the land," see Note 25 on section 40.

See also the undermentioned cases.[12]

See also Notes 35 and 36 on S. 105.

4. Clause (b)—Term limited conditionally.—A term may be limited conditionally, e. g., for forty years if the lessee or some other person named therein shall so long live. In such cases the lease would be determined at the end of forty years or on the death of the person or persons named, whichever should first happen.[1] On the happening of the event, the lessor may re-enter or maintain an ejectment without any proviso for re-entry.[2] A lease for 100 years if A and B shall so long live is determined by the death of one of them.[3] A lease "for the duration of the war" will be determined when peace is declared.[4] In the undermentioned case,[5] it was observed that a service tenancy under which the tenant holds the land on condition that if he refuses to render service the lease will determine, may fall within clause (b).

A lease granted for a definite purpose, ((eg) the holding of an exhibition,) will come under this clause (6). In such a case, the mere fact that the lessee is given a right under the lease to leave the land whenever he thinks fit will not entitle the lessor, on the doctrine of mutuality, to terminate the lease, at his option at any time.[7] plus juris ad alium transferre potest quam ipse haberet. It follows that where the interest of the lessor in the property terminates or his power to dispose of the same extends only to the happening of any event, the lease will terminate on the happening of such event. Thus, a lease by an owner for life will be determined on the death of the lessor.[1] Where a mortgagee grants a lease, the lease will determine on the redemption of the mortgage.[2] In the case of agricultural leases it has been held in some cases that a lease in the course of management, by the mortgagee does not terminate on redemption. See section 76, Note 6.

A sub-lease by a lessee for a term of years will be determined by the expiry of the period of the head lease.[3]

A Hindu widow or other limited owner in Hindu law is not a mere tenant for life. A lease by her does not necessarily terminate with her death. The reversioners may, at their option, treat it as valid for the full term leased or may treat it as determined on the death of the limited owner.[4] In the latter case the tenancy will be determined without any further act being necessary to determine it.[5]

6. Death of lessor and lessee.—The death of the lessor does not determine the lease, except in cases where his own interest ceases on his death or it is provided in the lease that the lease shall terminate on his death.[1]

A lease being a transfer of an interest in immovable property, is a heritable right.[2] The death of a lessee does not, therefore, terminate the lease but the interest survives to his legal representatives[3] except where the lease is for the life of the lessee.[4] Similarly, the death of one of the joint lessees will not determine the lease until both of them are dead without leaving any legal representative.[4a]

A lease whereby the lessee is given the right to hold the land as long as he pleases is generally regarded as a lease for the life of the lessee and according to this view, determinable by his death.[5] There is, however, a conflict of opinion on this point. (See S. 105, Note 27.) So also, as a general rule, a lease for an indefinite period.[6] A lease for five years with an agreement that the lessor would continue to give the land at the same rent, should the tenant require the land, is a lease for the life of the tenant. Where the tenant is a company the lease would last for the life of the company.[7] A lease to a company for a specific purpose would come to an end when the company becomes defunt.[8]

A lease for 100 years, if A and B shall so long live, terminates if one of them dies.[9]

As to the effect of the death of a lessee, intestate and without leaving any heirs, see section 105, Notes 6 and 42.

7. Clause (d)—Merger.—In England, at Common law, where a term of years and the free-hold in the property became vested in the same person in the same right and no other estate intervened between them, the term was swallowed up and merged in the free-hold estate.[1] In equity, however, merger was a question of intention of the parties. There was no merger if there was an intention to keep both the estates separate and alive.[2] It is now enacted by S. 185 of the English Law of Property Act, 1925, that " there is no merger by operation of law only of any estate the benificial interest in which would not be deemed to be merged or extinguished in equity." In other words the same rule now applies whether at law or in equity, namely, that merger is a question of intention of the parties.[3]

Before the passing of this Act the English doctrine of merger was generally held not applicable to the mofussil in this country[4] and in any case, it was regarded a matter of intention of the parties.[5]

Clause (d) of this section is a departure in this respect, from the present English law. It provides that, independent of any question of intention, where the interests of the lessor and the lessee become united in the same person at the same time in the same right there is a merger and the lease is extinguished.[6]

In cases outside the Act, it has been held that merger is a matter of intention

It has been held that by virtue of S. 2, clause (c) this clause will not apply where a lease is created before the Act, even though the union of interests is after the Act, and that the question of merger in such cases must be decided with reference to the rule of intention.[8]

There is no merger unless the interests united are co-extensive.[9] It is necessary that the interests of the lessor and the lessee in the whole of the property should become vested in the same person in the same right.[10] Thus, a lessee of the entire interest in certain properties acquiring one-eight interest in the proprietary rights thereof does not cause merger.[11] In other words, the purchase by the tenant of a fractional share of the property does not cause a merger.[12] So also, the taking by the tenant of a usufructuary mortgage of the holding deos not effect a merger.[13]

Where a merger takes place, subordinate interests derived from the lessee will also come to an end unless the holder of such subordinate interest can show some equity in his favour.[14]

8. Surrender—General.—A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to him who has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder wherein the estate for life or years may merge by mutual agreement.[1] It must be made only to the lessor. Where there are more lessors than one, it must be made to all of them.[2] Where, to the knowledge of the lessee, the lessor has transferred the property to x, the lessee cannot thereafter validly make a surrender to Y.[3] A tenant of one co-owner cannot make a valid surrender to another co-owner.[4]

A surrender by one of several joint lessees is valid only as to his share.[5] It does not avoid the lease.[6]

Surrender does not affect derivative interests.

It has been seen in Note 1 that the general rule is that the determination of the lease puts an end to all derivative interests from the lessee, but that the exception to the rule is a determination by surrender. A surrender cannot be made so as to prejudice the rights of a third person.[7] This is on the principle that a person cannot derogate from his own grant and also on the principle that two persons cannot enter into any agreement affecting the rights of a third party.[8] In Doe dem Beadon v. Pyke[9] Lord Ellenborough said :

> "We consider it as clear law, that though a surrender operates between the parties as an extinguishment of the interest which is surrendered, it does not so operate as to third persons, who at the time of the surrender, had rights, which such extinguishment would destroy, and that as to them, the surrender operates only as a grant, subject to their right, and the interest surrendered, still has, for the preservation of their right, continuance."

Thus, as is provided for in S. 115 a surrender does not affect the rights of a sub-lessee.[10] Where a valid mortgage has been executed by the lessee, the rights of the mortgagee are not affected by the surrender.[10a] Where such mortgage is a usufructuary one, the mortgagee is entitled to remain in possession until redemption.[11] Where the lessor has mortgaged the land and the right to receive the rent, he cannot, on the same principle, accept a surrender of the lease without the concurrence of the mortgagee.[12]

See also the undermentioned case.[13]

9. Express surrender—Clause (e).—To constitute an express surrender, there must be mutual agreement between the lessor and the lessee in pursuance of which the lessee yields up his iterest to the lessor. The requirement of mutual agreement implies that there is a yielding up or relinquishment by the lessee on the one hand and the acceptance of it by the lessor on the other. A mere relinquishment or abandonment by the lessee of the holding without acceptance on the part of the lessor is not a surrender.[1] The lessee cannot by merely giving notice of relinquishment get rid of his obligations under the lease. The mere fact that the lessor has received the notice cannot be construed as an assent on his part to the relinquishment.[2] Where, however, the lessor accepts the relinquishment it may amount to an implied surrender.[3] It has been held in the undermentioned case[4] that this clause does not apply to cases where the lease contains an express clause that the lessee should not surrender before the expiry of the term. This view does not appear to be correct. The lessee cannot, of course, insist on the lessor accepting the surrender before the expiry of the term, but if the lessor agrees to accept the surrender, there does not seem to be any reason why the clause should not apply.

The requirement as to the yielding up of the lessee's interest implies that the lessee must give up possession of the holding. A relinquishment without giving up possession is not a valid surrender.[5] Where a lease provided that the lessee may surrender any portion, or the whole of the property, and the lessee, by a written notice purported to surrender a portion of the property, but nevertheless continued in possession of a part of such portion, it was held that the surrender was not valid in law could be treated as valid to the extent to which possession was given up.[6] Where a lease for 999 years provided for the surrender of the lease by six months' notice by the lessee, and the lessee gave such notice and vacated the land demised, it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the surrender was properly made.[7]

A surrender need not be in writing[8]nor need it be in any particular form of words. But where the original lease is by a registered instrument, a surrender of a portion of the lease with an abatement of rent can be effected only by a registered instrument, inasmuch as such surrender effects a variation of the contract of tenancy embodied in a registered instrument.[9]

A conditional surrender will operate only on the performance of the condition.[10]

10. Clause (f)—Implied surrender.—This kind of surrender is, in English law, known as surrender by operation of law. It is applied to cases where the owner of a particular estate (e. g., a lease) has been a party to some act having some other object than that of a surrender, but which cannot be effected whilst the particular estate continues, and the validity of which act he is, by law, estopped from disputing.[1] The surrender, in such a case, is an act of the law and takes place independently of, and even in spite of, the intention of the parties.[2]

By acceptance of a new lease.

The illustration to the section is an instance of implied surrender. The acceptance of a new lease during the continuance of the old lease operates as a surrender in law, of the old lease.[3] The reason is, as pointed out by Parke, B., in Lyon v. Reed,[4] that :

> "If the lessee for years accept a new lease from his lessor, he is estopped from saying that his lessor had not power to make the new lease ; and, as the lessor could not do this until the prior lease had been surrender, the law says that the acceptance of such new lease is, of itself, a surrender of the former."

But, for this principle to apply, it is necessary that there must be an incompatibility between the enjoyment under the prior and that under the subsequent lease.[5] Thus, the subsequent grant, to the lessee of land for cultivation of coffee, of mining rights in such land does not imply a surrender of the lease for coffee cultivation.[6] The execution of a kabuliat by the tenant merely recognising an already existing right is not implied surrender of the old tenancy and the creation of a new one.[7] Such confirmatory pattas are very common in this country.[8] But the excution of rent deed by a permanent tenant in favour of his landlord embodying conditions inconsistent with his permanent tenancy has been held to amount to surrender of the permanent tenancy.[8a]

It is also necessary, for the new lease to operate as a surrender of the old one, that the new lease is operative. If the new lease is void or voidable[9] or does not pass an interest according to the contract or intention of the parties,[10] it does not operate as an implied surrender of the old lease. The reason is, that, in such cases, a condition is implied by law making void the surrender in case the new lease is inoperative.[11] Thus, a fresh lease by a Hindu widow for a fixed rent to the lessee under an earlier lease for a variable rent by the last male owner, does not operate as a surrender of the old lease inasmuch as her lease is a transaction voidable at the option of the reversioners.[12]

Where there is no actual demise by way of a new lease, a mere agreement to grant a new lease in the future[13] or an agreement for a change in the rent payable[14] or the acceptance of payment of rent from a person who has acquird an interest in the lease under an agreement with the tenant with the assent of the landlord,[15] does not operate as an implied surrender.

The taking of a new lease of a part of the lands covered by the old lease operates as an implied surrender of the old lease as to that part only. The lease for the residue will stand good and untouched.[16]

Though the taking of a new lease will be an implied surrender of the old lease, it will not affect the validity of the acts done under the old lease.[16a]

Relinquishment by tenant.

A mere non-payment of rent does not constitute an implied surrender.[17] So also a mere relinquishment of the tenancy does not operate as a surrender, but if it is accepted by the lessor by taking over possession, it amounts to an implied surrender.[18] If the key of the premises is handed over to the lessor and is accepted by him as a symbol of possession, there is an implied surrender.[19] But if it is not accepted, as a token of relinquishment of possession there is no implied surrender. Thus, where keys are left in the office of the lessor who is unable to return them to the lessee not being able to find him, there is no surrender.[20]

Tenant becoming a servant.

Where the lessee of a ferry finding his lease unprofitable accepted the position of a servant under the lessor for looking after the ferry for him, it was held that there was an implied surrender of the lease.[21]

11. Clause (g)—Forfeiture—General.—The word "forfeiture" implies the loss of a legal right by reason of some breach of obligation.[1] Clause (g) provides that a lease will determine by forfeiture in three cases—

(1) on breach of an express condition where a right of re-entry is provided for on such breach;
(2) on denial of the lessor's title by the lessee; and
(3) on the insolvency of the lessee where the lease provides, on such contingency, for a right of re-entry.

It may be noted that there can be no forfeiture in the first and third cases unless a right of re-entry is provided for. This qualification is not necessary in the second case.

It is also necessary before a lease can determine in any of these three cases that the lessor must give a notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease. Under the clause as it stood prior to the amendment of 1929, a notice in writing was not necessary, but the lessor was to do some act showing his intention to determine the lease. The reason is that a determination by forfeiture of a lease being the result of the wrongful act or omission of the lessee, it should not be at his option to determine the lease by his own wrongful act, the general principle being that no man can be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong.[2]

The law "abhors a forfeiture"[3] and the Courts both in England and in India lean strongly against forfeiture,[4] so that if the plaintiff comes to a Court relying on forfeiture, he must prove his right strictly;[5] this clause should not be extended to cases not strictly covered by it.[6]

But, though the law abhors a forfeiture, a covenant or condition entailing a forfeiture on breach thereof must, according to English cases,[7] be construed fairly according to the intention of the parties. In Goodtitle v. Salville,[8] Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said :

> "In the construction of covenants of this sort, they are neither entitled to favour nor disfavour, whether they are to create a forfeiture or to continue an estate ; but we are to put the fair construction upon them, according to the apparent intention of the contracting parties."

In the undermentioned cases,[9] however, it has been held that covenants, the breach of which entails forfeiture, are always to be strictly construed against the lessor. This does not appear to be in consonance with the English law.

Before this clause can be applied it must be established that there was a lease. Where this is not established, no question of forfeiture under this clause can arise.[10]

Where all the conditions of this clause are satisfied, the lease is determined and the lessor is entitled to eject the lessee, unless the forfeiture has been waived or relieved against. It has, however, been observed in the undermentioned case[11] that ejectment is a matter of discretion of the Court in such a case. It is submitted that this is not correct unless the decision can be assumed to mean a discretion to grant relief against the forfeiture.

A lease cannot be determined in part, by forfeiture.[12]

This clause provides for forfeiture only in the three contingencies specified therein. Waste by the lessee is not one of these contingencies. (See S. 108, cl. (o), Note 8.) But under the custom governing certain agricultural leases, as for instance the kanom in Malabar, wilful and extensive waste by the kanomdar is a ground of forfeiture.[13]

A wakf created by a tenant is not such a dealing with the property as to entail a forfeiture of tenancy.[14] other lease, to be forfeited on breach of a condition which provides that on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter[1] or on the ground of denial of title.[2]

13. Forfeiture for breach of condition.—Under the English law, a lease may be determined for a forfeiture incurred either by—

(1) breach of a condition in the lease or,

(2) breach of a covenant in case, and, in case only, the lease contains a proviso for re-entry for a breach of such covenant.[1]

A breach of a condition will, under the English law, entail a forfeiture even though there is no express clause for re-entry.[2] In this country before the Act was passed, it was held that there was no forfeiture, even in the case of a condition, unless there was a proviso for re-entry on its breach.[3]

This clause also not recognise the above distinction in English law. It speaks only of conditions and not of covenants and further provides that there would be a forfeiture only if the condition provides that on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter.. It has, however, been regarded generally as not limited to "conditions" in the strict sense in which the word is used in the English law, but as applying to all cases whether conditions or covenants, if there is a proviso for re-entry on breach thereof. The proviso for re-entry indeed converts, what would otherwise be a mere covenant, into a condition.

Even in cases not governed by the Act, it has been held as a general principal, that unless there is a proviso for re-entry, a breach of a condition or covenant will not not entail a forfeiture.[4]

A forfeiture for breach of a condition will take place under this section only—

(a) if the condition is express, and

(b) the condition provides that the lessor may re-enter on breach thereof.[5]

Under the section as it stood prior to its amendment in 1929, the words "or the lease shall become void" occurred after the words "on breach thereof the lessor may re-enter." This was based on a distinction which had, at one time, been recognised in England between a clause for re-entry and a clause of nulity, namely, that a forfeiture in the former case could be relieved against but a forfeiture in the latter case could not.[6] Even in England, such a distinction was not recognised in later cases.[7] A lease providing that on breach of a condition, it shall become void was held only to be a viodable transaction[8] the reason being that the lessee could not be allowed to free himself, by reason of his own wrongful act, from his obligation.[9] Further, S. 114 provided for relief against forfeiture irrespective of the fact whether there was a clause for re-entry or a clause for nullity on breach of the condition. The words "or the lease shall become void" have been removed by the amendment of the section in 1929 as they served no useful purpose.

The condition, in order to effect a forfeiture, must be a valid one. In Maharajah of Iepore v. Rukmini,[10] it was held by their Lordships of the privy Council that the breach of a condition of attendance by the lessee on the lessor on ceremonial occasions did not a operate to cause a forfeiture.

What is meant by an "express condition" is, not that the wording of it should be in any particular form, but that the condition can be gathered from the words of the instrument, giving to them their ordinary meaning so that the Court may be certain that such condition was part of the stipulation between the parties and was understood to be so by them.[11]

Condition against alienation.

Section 10 provides that a condition against alienation in a lease is valid if it is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him. Under this clause it has been held that even a valid condition against alienation will not operate to cause a forfeiture or render the alienation in breach of it inoperative, unless there is a proviso for re-entry by the lessor for the breach of the condition.[12] But it may be questioned whether this view is consistent with S. 10 which expressly recognises the validity of conditions restraining alienation inserted in leases for the benefit of the lessor. (See S. 10 Note 13.) This clause has no application to tenures, one of the incidents of which is that it is transferable, or to tenures, one of the incidents of which is that it is not transferable. An alienation will not cause a forfeiture in the former case[13] while in the latter, a transfer will put an end to the tenure though no right of re-entry is reserved.[14]

A Condition against alienation means a condition against alienation by act of parties and not one by operation of law or in execution of a decree.[15]

A condition against alienation is not broken by an alienation of a part of demised premises[16] or by an alienation by only one of several lessees,[17] through, where the share of each tenant is specified, the landlord may re-enter on the share of the person alienating but not on the share of the others.[18] But where he entire demised land's transferred by the tenant by separate alienations, in parts, of the demised property, it has been held that in such a case the condition against alienation is broken and would work as a forfeiture of the lease.[18a] A condition against an assignment is not broken by a sub-dimise of the lease by way of mortgage.[19] A condition against sub-letting is not broken by the letting of lodgings[19a] or by letting part of the premises.[19b] Nor is a condition against alienation broken by an alienation which is not valid and operative.[20] A conditoin against alienation to "any person or persons" is not broken by an alienation by one lessee of his share in favour of his co-lessee.[20a] For an instance of a restrictive condition against assignment, see the undermentioned case.[20b]

Non-payment of rent.

The due payment of rent may be an express condition in the lease, a breach of which may cause a forfeiture.[21] There must, in this case also, as in the case of other conditions causing a forfeiture, be a provision for re-entry on breach of such conditions.[22] Under the English common law, it was necessary for the lessor before he could claim forfeiture for non-payment of rent, to demand the rent on the exact day on which the forfeiture accrued at the proper place of payment and at a covenant hour before sunset.[23] This rule does not apply in this country.[24]

Breach of condition by lessor.

The act does not provide for the determination of a lease for a term by the lessee for breach of a condition by the lessor. The lessee cannot therefore avoid a lease for a branch of a covenant by the lessor, e.g., to have a latrine constructed, a well sunk, and a room upstirs built.[25]

14. Forfeiture for denial of title.—The law as to forfeiture of a lease by denial of the lessor's title is not the ancient law of India but has been adopted from the law of England[1] and was applied even before the enactment of this Act[2] on the ground that the rules of forfeiture in England were in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience.[3]

Under the English law, it is only a tenancy for a term of year that is forfeited by a denial or disclaimer by the tenant of the landlord's title. A disclaimer of the landlord's title in the case of a tenancy from year to year operates to put an end to the tenancy, not by forfeiture, but as evidence of an election to put an end to the tenancy and supersede the necessity of a notice to quit.[4] This Act, while importing general doctrine of English law of forfeiture by denial of title by the tenant does not recognise the above distinction between a lease for a term of years and other leases, as regards forfeiture.[5]

The landlord's right of forfeiture arising from disclaimer of title is no part of the contract of tenancy but is a right which the law implies in all cases from the relation of landlord and tenant.[6]

In order to constitute a disclaimer of title there must be a direct repudiation of the relation of landlord and tenant or a distinct claim to hold the estate on a ground wholly inconsistent with the existence of such relation, which, by necessary implication is a repudiation of it.[7] A disclaimer is thus a renunciation by the party of his character of tenant either by setting up a title in another, or by claiming title in himself[7a] and the denial must be by clear and unambiguous words,[8] and to the knowledge of the landlord.[9] Thus, a statement by a tenant to the landlord "you are not my landlord. I am nobody's tenant" is a disclaimer of title.[10] In case of leases to which the provisions of this Act do not apply, it has been that a disclaimer of landlord's title unless it is a judicial proceeding or other public document, which is covered by the term "record" in English law, is not enough to work a forfeiture.[10a]

This view has not been followed in India,[12] and it has been held that where tenant admits a tenancy but disputes the terms of the tenancy or sets up a more favourable tenancy such as a permanent tenancy, it is not such a repudiation of the tenancy as would cause forfeiture.[13]

quires further information bona fide before he pays the rent to anybody[15] there is no disclaimer of title. Where there is no renunciation of the lease the lessee, being unable to get possession of a part of the property claimed by a third person executed a lease to him in respect of that part, there is no denial of title.[16]

Denial of extent of interest of landlord.

An admission in good faith by a tenant, of the superior title of a third person to a portion of the lands included in the tenancy without denying the landlord's title to receive the entire rent is not such a denial as would entail a forfeiture.[17] the possession of the tenant adverse to the landlord.[24] (See also S. 105, Note 79.) Coupled with other circumstances it may, however, constitute a denial of title.[25]

Renunciation of tenancy.

A mere renunciation of tenancy is not a disclaimer of title unless there is a repudiation of the character of landlord and tenant by setting up a title in another or by claiming title in himself.[26]

Alienation of lease interest.

An alienation by the lessee by way of a sale or a mortgage is not necessarily a denial of title of the landlord[27] though it may be evidence of such denial.

Denial by a joint tenant.

A denial of title by some only of several joint tenants does not work a forfeiture of the tenancy.[28]

Denial of title after assignment of lease.

The denial of title by the lessee, after an assigment by him of the lease to another cannot work a forfeiture of the assignee's interest.[29]

Denial of title must have before suit for ejectment.

Effect of denial of title.

The general principle is that a tenant denying the title of the landlord becomes liable to immediate eviction at the option of the landlord.[34] He cannot claim to be entitled in such a case to any notice to quit[35] or to any notice specified in the lease for determining the lease.[36] The reason is that by such denial, he must be deemed to waive his right to notice.[37] As was observed by Best, C. J., in Doe v. Frowd[38] "there can be no necessity for a notice to end that which he (i.e., the tenant) says has no existence."

15. Forfeiture on insolvency of lessee.—Under the second paragraph of s. 12 a condition in a lease making the lease cease on the lessee becoming insolvent is a valid condition. But there was no specific provision in this section for determination of the lease on breach of such a condition. The Special Committee in their report on the Amendment Bill of 1929 appear to have thought that such a condition did not operate to determine the lease under this clause, though the first part of cl. (g) seems to cover all kinds of conditions. Anyhow the Committee having thought it desirable to make an express provision on that point, this provision as to a condition against insolvency of the lessee was inserted in the section in 1929. In England also, a condition for re-entry on forfeiture on the insolvency of the lessee is a valid condition.[1] Where, in a lease, there was a condition for re-entry on the insolvency of the lessee, and the lessee's interest was purchased in execution of a decree by X and thereafter the lessee became insolvent, it was held that the "lessee" for the purpose of the condition, was under the cirucmstances, really X and that as be did not become insolvent, no forfeiture took place.[2]

A disclaimer of a lease by the Official Assignee under S. 62 of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, 1909, puts an end to the lease and the lessor's interest becomes thereby accelerated without anything further being done.[3]

16. Notice of intention to determine lease on forfeiture.—Where a forfeiture is incurred, by reason of an act or omission on the part of the lessee, the lessor has an option to take advantage of it, for the lessee himself cannot take advantage of his own wrong, which would be the result if the lease were to terminate ipso facto on such act or omission.[1] The general rule therefore is that the lessor must do some act evidencing his intention to determine the lease.[2] This was embodied in the section as it stood before 1929 and it was necessary that the lessor should, for determining a lease by forfeiture do some act showing his intention to determine the lease.[3] Under the English law, the bringing of an action in ejectment is itself a sufficient act determining the lease.[4] There was, however, a difference of opinion in this country, one set of cases[5] holding that the act must have been done before the institution of the suit while another set of cases[6] held that the institution of the suit was a sufficient act in itself determining the tenancy. This difference of opinion has now been set at rest by the substitution in 1929 of the words "gives notice in writing to the lessee of" for the words "does some act showing" which occurred before. Under the present section, therefore, the lessor wishing to determine the lease for forfeiture must give a notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease[7] and the service of such notice must be proved by legal evidence.[8]

It has, however, been held by the Rangoon High Court that "giving notice" is something less, in a legal sense, than "serving notice," and that a lessor sufficiently complies with the requirements of this clause if he sends to his lessee, by prepaid ordinary post, at his last known address, a letter in which he declares his intention to determine the lease, although the lessee never received it.[8a]

It has been held in the undermentioned cases[9] that in cases not governed by the Act, the necessity for an overt act showing the intention to determine the lease is not necessary.

Where a lease provides that on breach of condition the lessee should be given notice according to law before ejectment, the tenant cannot be ejected unless a notice according to the contract is given.[10]

Clause (g) of this section, requires in the case of a forfeiture, merely that the lessor or his transferee gives notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease, but prescribes no period for that purpose.[11] Nor is the notice required to state the grounds upon which the lessor claims to be entitled to determine the lease.[12]

Conditional notice :—Where the fulfilment or non-fulfilment of a condition attached to a notice under this clause rests entirely with the tenant, the notice is a good notice of the lessor's intention to determine the lease. The position would, however, be otherwise if the fulfilment of the condition depends wholly or partly upon chance, or on the lessor's whim.[13]

A lease does not come to an end as soon as a notice to determine the lease is given. Something more, such as an actual entry or the institution of a suit in ejectment, is required to be done by the lessor to end it.[14]

It has been held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that even though the lease expires by efflux of time, a tenant who has been let into possession under the lease cannot deny the landlord's title under S. 116 of the Evidence Act, so long as he has not openly restored possession by surrender to his landlord.[1] Even where the tenant has not been let into possession by X, if once the relation of landlord and tenant comes into existence between them, the tenant cannot dispute the title of X.[2] An under-tenant or assignee from the lessee or a person who comes in by collusion with the lessee is bound by the estoppel against the tenant (his lessor) and cannot deny the title of the original landlord.[3]

But it is always open to a tenant to show that the landlord's title has determined, since the beginning of the relationship of landlord and tenant between them.[4] It is also open to him to show that his acknowledgment of a person as a landlord was due to fraud, coercion, or misrepresentation.[5]

Since a tenant cannot deny his landlord's title his possession also cannot become adverse to the landlord so long as the tenancy continues.[6]

18. Re-entry on forfeiture under clause (g) need not be enforced by suit—Where a right of re-entry has accrued to the landlord on breach of condition, the property reverts to the landlord and the latter can, if he can do so peaceably and quietly, re-enter and take possession of the demised property. It is not necessary that he should sue for this purpose.[1] But if the lessee resists the plaintiff's entry, then the lessor's only remedy is to sue in ejectment and not to make a forcible entry.[2] A condition for re-entry by force is void.[3]

19. Who can enforce forfeiture.—As has been seen already, the lessee himself cannot take advantage of his own wrong and cannot vacate a lease for forfeiture caused by his own act.

As a rule the lessor can enforce the forfeiture unless he has parted with his interest.[1] A transfer of the reversion (i. e., the lessor's interest) carries with it the right to enforce a forfeiture, and the transferee can enforce the same even if the forfeiture was incurred before the transfer was made.[2] Thus, a usufructuary mortgagee of the lessor of his interest can enforce a forfeiture clause in the lease given by the mortgagor.[3] In the undermentioned case[4] where after a notice to determine the lease had been given, the lessor granted a new lease in favour of a third person it was held that the latter could enforce the forfeiture against the previous lessee.

As to whether one of several joint lessors can determine the lease for forfeiture, see Note 26.

20. Waiver of forfeiture.—See Notes on Section 112.

21. Relief against forfeiture.—See Notes on Section 114 and 114A.

22. Forfeiture of service tenures.—The principles relating to forfeiture apply also to service tenures, i. e., tenures granted on the condition of performance of services. In cases to which the Act does not apply, the refusal to perform service will, according to the undermentioned cases,[1] terminate the lease even without any overt act being done by the lessor to terminate the lease. In cases governed by cl. (g) as it stood prior to 1929, it was held that an overt act by the landlord was necessary to determine the lease.[2] Under the present clause a notice in writing determining the lease is necessary.[3]

A notice to quit, is, however, not necessary for determining a lease where a forfeiture has been incurred for refusal to perform the service.[4]

23. Notice to quit or determine the lease—Clause (h).—In the case of a lease from year to year or from month to month, it is, in the absence of a contract or local law or usage to the contrary, terminable by a notice to quit under S. 106.[1] Where, in the case of such leases, there is a contract or local law or usage to the contrary, and in cases of leases where the contract of tenancy provides for notice before determination of the lease, the lease is terminable by a notice to determine the lease as contemplated by the contract or local law or usage.[2]

A notice to quit or to determine the lease is necessary only where the tenancy is valid and admitted to exist between the parties. Where there is no tenancy at all[3] or where the tenancy is denied[4] or where a lease is cancelled on the ground of fraud[4a] no such notice is necessary before suing for ejectment.

A lease whether governed by the Act or not, if not determined in any of the modes provided by clauses (a) to (g) of the section, can be determined only by a proper notice to quit or to determine the lease.[5]

The notice to quit or to determine the lease must be duly given by the one party to the other before the tenancy can be determined, that is to say, it must be given as required by S. 106 or as required by the contract of lease, if any, or by the local law or usage governing the case. An invalid notice does not determine the lease or render the possession of the tenant wrongful.[6] But where an invalid notice is accepted by the landlord and the defect is waived, the lease will be terminated.[7] Where a tenant gives a notice of his intention to quit by a particular date, but does not vacate fully on that date, the landlord is entitled to another notice to quit or an equivalent rent for the period of notice.[8] Where there has been an assignment of the lease by the lessee, the lessor is only bound to give the notice to quit to the lessee and not the assignee.[8a]

A notice to quit or determine the lease must be given before a suit for ejectment is instituted.[9] The Court cannot in its decree in a suit for ejectment give such notice.[10]

As to whether a plea of want of notice can be taken for the first time in second appeal, see the undermentioned cases.[11]

23a. Lease and Rent Control Legislation.—Madras Buildings (lease and Rent Control) Act (XV of 1946).—It has been held in the case noted below[1] that a notice to quit is not necessary before filing an application for eviction to the Rent Controller under S. 7 of that Act and that S. 111 (h), T. P. Act, has no place in the scheme of procedure laid down in S. 7 of the Madras Act. It was also observed that even if such notice to quit was necessary it would be merely one of the issues to be decided by the Rent Controller and would not in any way affect his jurisdiction to entertain the application.

24. Tenancy at will.—A tenancy at will is a tenancy only so long as both parties are willing to continue it. Either party may terminate it by expressing his desire to do so.[1] It has been held that it is not a "lease" as defined by the Act[2] and this section has, therefore, no application to such tenancy. The observations in the undermentioned case[3] that the tenancy might be terminated under clause (h) of this section are inconsistent with the above view.

A tenancy at will is determined by the death of the tenant or the landlord.[4]

No formal notice is necessary to terminate a tenancy at will.[5] A verbal demand for possession is enough to terminate it.[6] See also S. 105, Note 32 and S. 106, Note 6.

25. Leases not governed by the Act.—To tenancies created before the Act and to tenancies excepted from its operation, the principles of English law as to the determination of leases have been applied, as being in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience.[1] This section is largely based on the English law and, consequently, the principles underlying it may be applied to such cases but not its technical rules. In applying such principles the Courts should have due regard to the equities of the case.[3]

A tenancy not governed by the Act and not determined on any grounds referred to in clauses (a) to (g) can only be determined by a reasonable notice to quit.[4]

By some Provincial Acts a right of forfeiture is excluded for denial of the landlord's title.[5] In such a case, of course, the law of forfeiture as laid down in this section or by the English law cannot be applied. Where there is no such exclusion the general principles of the law of forfeiture will apply.

26. Joint lessors—Termination of lease.—Under the English law one of several joint lessors may determine the lease and recover his share. A notice by a joint lessor on behalf of himself and the others will terminate the lease as to all.[1] This is not the law in this country. All of them must act.[2] It has been held by the High Court of Madras that where a lease is granted by several joint lessors, containing a clause for forfeiture for non-payment of rent and subsequent to the lease the lessors become divided, each of them can enforce the forfeiture clause for non-payment of his share of the rent, by virtue of the principles underlying sections 37 and 109 of the Act.[3]

Where once a lease has been properly determined, one of the lessors may maintain a suit in ejectment, making the others parties to the suit.[4]

27. Possession after determination of tenancy. The possession of a tenant who holds over after the determination of the tenancy, without the consent of the landlord is wrongful possession, though not adverse possession.[1] As a person in wrongful possession he will be liable to pay damages to the lessor for such unlawful occupation.[2] The use of the words "damages for use and occupation" in such cases is not strictly correct. As seen in Note 40 on S. 105, the said words imply an occupation by a person with the permission of the owner in which case the law implies a contract to pay compensation for such occupation.[3]

112. A forfeiture under section 111, clause (g), is waived by acceptance of rent which has become due since the forfeiture, or by distress for such rent, or by any other act on the part of the lessor showing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting :

waiver of forfeiture

Provided that the lessor is aware that the forfeiture has been incurred :

Provided also that, where rent is accepted after the institution of a suit to eject the lessee on the ground of forfeiture, such acceptance is not a waiver.

1. Scope of the section.—It has been seen in the Notes on S. 111, that incurring of a cause of forfeiture by the lessee does not ipso facto determine the tenancy. but that it is at the option of the lessor to elect whether he would determine the tenancy or not. The Courts always lean against forfeiture,[1] and if the lessor, knowing that a forfeiture has been incurred, does any act whereby he acknowledges the continuance of the tenancy, at a later period, he will be regarded in law as having waived the forfeiture.[2] This rule is enacted in this section. The rule really rests on the principle enunciated by the maxim allegans contraria non est audiendus (he is not to be heard who alleges things contradictory to each other). A lessor cannot proceed on the footing that a lease subsists and at the same time claim that it has been forfeiture.[3]

Where once the forfeiture is waived, the lessor cannot be allowed to retract from it.[4] "Cases of forfeiture," said Lord Mansfield in Goodright v. David,[5] "are not favoured in law ; and where the forfeiture is once waived, the Court will not assist it."

No question of waiver arises where a lease has been determined by the landlord taking advantage of forfeiture.[6] But the lease will not be at an end merely on the service of the notice under S. 111 (g) until the landlord actually enters on the property or institutes a suit in ejectment or does something of a similar nature. Till then, the lease is only voidable and not void and hence, an acceptance of rent accruing due after forfeiture will amount to waiver even if the acceptance is after the service of the notice.[6a] A distinction must be made between the waiver of forfeiture of a lease and the creation of a new lease.[6b]

The principle of this section has been applied to the Punjab and the Delhi province as being consonant with justice, equity and good conscience.[7]

2. Acceptance of rent.—The acceptance of rent accruing due after the forfeiture operates as a matter of law to waive all forfeitures then known to the lessor.[1] It operates as a waiver even though it is accepted under protest[2] or conditionally without prejudice to the forfeiture[3] and even though the lease provides that a waiver must be expressed in writing.[4] The fact that the rent received credited to a suspense account will not prevent it from operating as a waiver of forfeiture.[5] So also the fact that the rent which had accrued due since the forfeiture but prior to the issue of the notice was accepted subsequents to the service of the notice will not make any difference.[5a]

The rent accepted must be rent which has accrued due since the forfeiture.[6] The acceptance of rent due prior to forfeiture, though made after forfeiture does not operate as a waiver.[7] The reason is that the acceptance of money as rent due subsequent to forfeiture shows that the landlord acts on the view that the lease is subsisting, and not as forfeited, whereas there is nothing inconsistent in a landlord accepting rent due before the supposed determination of the lease.[8]

It is not necessary that the rent should have been paid by the lessee. Acceptance of rent from any person in possession, such as a sub-lessee, will operate as a waiver.[9]

Where a tenant incurs forfeiture under the provisions of Calcutta House Rent Control Order (1943) by falling into arrears with regard to his rent, subsequent acceptance if rent by the landlord will not amount to a waiver so as to entitle the tenant to the protection of the Order.[10] This is on the principle that a general provision must yield to a special provision. Where after the forfeiture of the lease of the lessee remits certain amount as rent it has been held that acceptance of the amount by the landlord, even though as damages for use and occupation, will operate as a waiver of the forfeiture.

3. Distress for rent.—Where the lessor distrains for rent, he thereby affirms by a solemn act that a tenancy subsists. Consequently, on the principle stated in Note 1, the forfeiture is waived. Under the English law, there is a distinction drawn between a waiver by acceptance of rent and a waiver by distress for rent. An acceptance of rent is a waiver only where the rent is for a period subsequent to the forfeiture. But a distress, even if it be for rent due prior to forfeiture, will operate as a waiver of the forfeiture. The reason is that there can be a distress in England only during the subsistence of relationship of landlord and tenant, so that the taking out a distress at any time involves the position that the lease is subsisting at that time.[1] This Act does not recognise this distinction ; a distress will not operate as a waiver unless it be for rent due subsequent to forfeiture. This is made clear by the use of the words "by distress for such rent."

As to a right of distress in this country, apart from agricultural tenancies see S. 53 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882).

4. "Any other act."—The acceptance of rent, and the distress for rent are only important illustrations of acts on the part of the lessor showing intention to treat the lease as subsisting. As instances of other acts may be mentioned the following :

(1) Demand for rent due after forfeiture.[1]

(2) Action for rent due after forfeiture.[2] There is a difference of opinion as to whether a suit in which ejectment on forfeiture is claimed and also rent up to the date of delivery of possession constitutes a waiver; one view being that it is a waiver,[3] while according to another view, it is not.[4] It is submitted that the latter view is correct.

(3) A fresh notice to terminate a tenancy is waiver of prior forfeiture.[5]

(4) A notice to quit given by the lessor.[6]

See also the undermentioned cases.[7]

A forfeiture may also be expressly waived. In England an express waiver of forfeiture was originally regarded as a waiver of the covenant itself so that no question of forfeiture could arise at all thereafter for later breaches of the covenant.[8] This was not followed in India[9] and even in England an express waiver now operates only as a waiver of the particular breach for which the forfeiture was incurred.[10]

The words "any other act" show that there must be a positive act. It is not sufficient that the lessor, knowing that a forfeiture has been incurred, is merely silent[11]

although long continued acquiescence in repeated breaches of a covenant has been regarded in England as a waiver.[12]

Where the lessor in granting a receipt for rent due prior to forfeiture, described the grantee of the receipt as a "tenant," it was held that this did not show that he intended to treat the lease as subsisting and was therefore not a waiver.[13]

Where the landlord allowed extra time for removal of meterial, there is no waiver of forfeiture.[14]

5. Knowledge of breach.—The first proviso merely reproduces the English law, that in order to render acceptance of rent or any other act a waiver of a forfeiture the lessor must have notice or knowledge of the forfeiture at the time of the supposed waiver.[1] For, a man cannot be said to waive that of which he has no knowledge. The onus is on the lessee to show such knowledge on the part of the lessor.[2]

6. Effect of waiver.—A waiver of a forfeitures operates not only as regards the particular forfeiture incurred but also all prior causes of forfeiture.[1] But it does not preclude the lessor from taking advantage of subsequent causes of forfeiture.[2]

Where the breach is of a continuing nature the waiver of any forfeiture up to a certain day will afford no defence to an ejectment for a subsequent breach as where the covenant is to keep the premises in repair during the term.[3]

A waiver once made is irrevocable as to the forfeiture waived, and the lessor cannot subsequently claim to enforce the forfeiture.[4]

7. Second proviso.—An acceptance of rent after the institution of a suit for ejectment on the ground of forfeiture is not a waiver.[1] In England even a distress for rent does not operate as a waiver if it is after the institution of a suit for ejectment.[2] It is doubtful if any act, other than the acceptance of rent, showing an intent to treat the lease as subsisting, will not operate as waiver, even if such act is done after the institution of the suit.

TOPIC INDICATOR

Distinction between waiver of notice to quit and waiver of forfeiture. See Note 2.
Waiver of notice to quit—Instances. See Note 3.

1. Scope of the section.—Section 112 deals with waiver of forfeiture under S. 111, cl. (g). This section deals with waiver of notice to quit under S. 111, cl. (h), and reproduces substantially the English law on the subject.[1] There is a fundamental difference between a waiver of forfeiture (which is a matter which can be done at the election of the landlord alone) and what is inaccurately referred to as the waiver of a notice to quit, (which can only proceed on the basis that the landlord and tenant are ad idam in making a new agreement.[1a]

The section applies only to leases that are admittedly determinable by a notice to quit, that is, to leases from year to year and from month to month. The section will not apply where the landlord claims to treat the tenant as a tenant from year to year but the latter asserts a permanent tenancy.[2]

Where a lease is determined by a notice to quit, and the landlord subsequently receives rent from the tenant the rights and liabilities of the parties must be decided with reference to this section and not S. 116.[3]

2. "With the express or implied consent."—A waiver of a notice to quit under this section can be made only with the express or implied consent of the person to whom notice is given. In this respect it differs from a waiver of forfeiture which depends upon the exercises of the option by the lessor alone. This is also the English law on the point.[1]

3. Act showing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting.— Waiver is a matter of intention of the parties. The act alleged to constitute waiver must import the recognition of the tenancy. The illustrations to the section give two instances of waiver :

(1) acceptance of rent which has become due since the expiration of the notice to quit, and

(2) giving a second notice to quit.

Acceptance of rent.

The acceptance of rent accrued due before the date of the notice to quit is not a waiver of the notice to quit.[1] The acceptance of rent accrued due subsequent to the notice is a waiver of the notice.[2] It clearly indicates that the lessor intends to treat the lease as subsisting. The payment of rent by the lessee also shows that the lessee impliedly consents to waiver. But acceptance of rent by the lessor under a mistake will not amount to such waiver.[2a] So also, the acceptance of an amount as damages for use and occupation though tendered as rent will not amount to waiver.[2b] In other words, the acceptance of an amount tendered as rent will not necessarily imply an intention to " treat the lease as subsisting. "

A mere demand for the rent accrued due subsequent to the notice not followed by a promise by the tenant to pay cannot operate as a waiver of the notice, for want of the tenant's consent.[3] On the same principle, a claim in a suit for ejectment for the arrears of rent due is not a waiver of the notice.[4] So also mere abortive negotiations between the parties with regard to the payment of rent subsequent to the notice do not constitute a waiver.[5]

By virtue of the second proviso to S. 112 the acceptance of rent, even though subsequent to a forfeiture, does not constitute a waiver of the forfeiture if such acceptance is made after a suit for ejectment is instituted against the lessee on the ground of forfeiture. There is no provision corresponding to that proviso in this section and it has been held that the acceptance of rent due subsequent to the notice to quit, even after the institution of a suit for ejectment, will operate as a waiver of such notice.[6] A contrary view has, however, been taken in the undermentioned cases.[6a] In the undermentioned case[7] where, pending a suit for ejectment the Court passed an order by consent of parties by which certain payments were made by the defendant and accepted by the plaintiff, it was held that such acceptance would not constitute a waiver of the notice.

The fact that the lessor accepts the rent under protest as where he states that he accepts it as damages for use and occupation will not prevent it from operating as a waiver of the notice.[8]

Second notice to quit.

The giving of a second notice to quit is a waiver of the first notice to quit.[9] This is also shown by the Illustration (b) under the section. The consent of the lessee to the waiver is implied in this case by his continuing in possession in spite of the first notice to quit. But the circumstances may show that in giving the second notice to quit, the landlord had no intention of waiving the first notice—as, for instance, where the notice is given as a preliminary to recovering double value or where the landlord is at the same time proceeding for recovery of possession.[9a] A party who denies having given a first notice to quit, cannot on being found against on that point, plead that his second notice was a waiver of the first.[10]

Distress for rent.

A distress for rent due subsequent to the notice to quit is an act showing an intention to treat the lease as subsisting (see S. 112), and if acquiesced in by the tenant, will operate as a waiver of the notice.[11]

Acts not amounting to waiver.

The mere fact that the tenant is allowed to remain in possession, out of favour, after the expiry of the notice to quit[12] or the fact that no suit is filed for ejectment immediately on the expiry of the notice[13] does not operate as a waiver. The acceptance of rent by an unauthorised person does not bind the landlord and will not constitute a waiver of the notice.[14] In the case of cosharers, the acceptance of rent by one of them will operate as waiver only in so far as he is concerned. The others will not be affected thereby.[15] Where there is an arrangement between the landlord and the tenant that the municipal taxes paid by the tenant would be set off against rent, any tax paid by the tenant after the service of notice to quit would not constitute a waiver of the notice, in the absence of any further arrangement after the service of notice.[16]

4. Effect of waiver.—Under the English law, a withdrawal or abandonment of the notice to suit before its expiry does not nullify the notice but operates as evidence of an agreement for a new tenancy on the expiration of the old one. After the expiry of the notice, a waiver of it operates by creating a new tenancy, the old tenancy being determined by the notice.[1] Under this section, it has been held that the effect of waiver is that the tenancy is not regarded as having been at all determined, but is regarded as continuing.[2] A guarantor for rent under a tenancy would not, under the English law, be liable after the expiry of a notice to quit even if, subsequently, the notice is waived.[3] It is doubtful whether this principle is applicable where a notice to quit is waived under this section.

1. Scope.—It is a general principle that wherever a penalty is provided to secure the performance of an act, the latter is considered as the principal intent of the instrument and the penalty is deemed only as necessary and intended only to secure such performance.[1] On this principle where the forfeiture of a lease and an entry for the forfeiture is stipulated for in a lease, in case of non-payment of rent, the right of re-entry is deemed merely as a security for the payment of the rent.[2] So that if the lessee makes adequate compensation to the landlord and puts him in the same position as if the rent had been paid to him when it was due, the purpose of the clause of forfeiture, namely to secure the rent is served and lessee would be relieved from the forfeiture by a Court of Equity.[3]

By virtue of S. 117, this section does not apply to agricultural leases. The section is not also applicable to the Punjab to which the Transfer of Property Act does not apply. But in all such cases, the general principle on which this section is based will be applicable and Courts can grant relief against forfeiture on such conditions and in such circumstances as may appear equitable,[5] but are not bound by the conditions laid down in this section.[6]

2. Law before the Transfer of Property Act of 1882.—The principle on which this section is based was applied even before the passing of this Act.[1]

The second paragraph of S. 78 of the Bengal Rent Act (X of 1859) provided for relief against forfeiture and ran as follows :

> "In all cases of suits for the ejectment of a raiyat or the cancelment of a lease, the decree shall specify the amount of the arrear, and, if such amount together with interest and costs of suit be paid into Court within fifteen days from the date of the decree, execution shall be stayed."

3. "Lessor."—The word "lessor" includes an assignee of the lessor's rights. As has been seen in Notes on S. 111 an assignee of the lease can also enforce a forfeiture of the lease for non-payment of rent and if, in a suit by him for ejectment on the ground of forfeiture, the tenant pays up the rent in arrears the Court can grant relief against forfeiture.[1]

4. "Lessee."—In England an under-tenant is entitled to claim relief from forfeiture in the same way as the tenant can, a liberal construction being placed on the word "tenant."[1] It has been held in the undermentioned cases[2] that the word "lessee" in this section must similarly be liberally construed as including transferees from him and that such transferees also can claim relief under this section.[3]

Where there are several transferees from the lessees and only some of them claim relief against forfeiture, they must pay the whole of the amount due to the lessor with interest and costs.[4]

4a. "Pays or tenders".—Under the section there must be an actual payment or tender before the Court. Mere readiness to pay will not be sufficient.[1]

5. "At the hearing of the suit."—The payment or tender mentioned in this section must be made "at the hearing of the suit." The word "suit" would include an appeal also, and consequently the payment or tender may be made at the hearing of the appeal and relief claimed under this section.[1]

In England the lessee is entitled, even after the trial and judgment, to apply for relief within six months of such judgment.[2] This rule has not been adopted in this Act, and no relief can be granted to the tenant under this Act after an order for ejectment has been passed.[3]

6. "Rent in arrear."—As already seen in Note 1, this section is based on the principle of equity that where the object of the clause of forfeiture, namely, to secure the rent, is fulfilled and the tenant puts the landlord in the same position as if no default in payment had been made, the forfeiture should be relieved against. If the tenant seeks equity by asking for this equitable relief he must do equity : he must pay all that is due to the lessor. Hence, the words "rent in arrear" must be taken to mean all the rent due up to the date of relief and not merely the rent for the non-payment of which the forfeiture of the lease had occurred.[1] The expression "rent in arrear" will also include the rent which the lessor may be unable to recover under the law relating to limitation. The reason is that though the lessor's remedy under the law to recover the rent is lost, the tenant's liability in equity to pay the rent subsists ; and if this duty is not discharged the tenant is not entitled to the equitable relief under this section.[2]

7. "The Court may pass an order."—The word "may" shows that the Court has a discretion in the matter which it may exercise according to the circumstances of the case.[1] In the absence of special circumstances which would go against the lessee, the Court will generally exercise its discretion in favour of granting relief.[2] The mere fact that the lessee sets up a plea of payment which he fails to prove will not, in itself, disentitle him to relief.[3] But such a fact may, along with other circumstances, disentitle him to the relief.[4]

A lessee who wants relief under this section must come to the Court with clean hands. Where the conduct of a tenant qua tenant has been such that it would be unreasonable that the landlord should be compelled to keep him as a tenant, relief against forfeiture will not be granted.[5]

The relief is also subject to other equities that may have arisen between the date of the forfeiture and the application for relief.[6] Thus, where the landlord, during that period, has re-let the premises to a third party or otherwise dealt with them, relief under this section will not be given.[7] The reason is that the equities in favour of the third party or the transferee are greater than those in favour of the tenant who has committed a default in payment giving rise to forfeiture.

Relief against forfeiture will not be given also where the landlord and other interested parties cannot be put in the same position as if no default in payment had been made. In Stenhope v. Haworth[8] there was a forfeiture of a lease of a colliery, for non-payment of rent. The lessee applied for relief against forfeiture just before the expiry of the period allowed by the law to make such applications. In the meantime the landlord had to maintain the colliery and third parties had offered to take it and had incurred expenses. It was held that relief could not be given against forfeiture inasmuch as the parties could not be put back in the same position as they were in before.

The question whether the lessor has or has not entered and dispossessed the tenant is immaterial in deciding whether relief should or should not be granted under this section.[9]

Where the discretion has been exercised by the Court one way or the other, it will not be interfered with by the appelate Court unless it is clear that the first Court had not exercised its discretion on proper judicial principles.[10]

8. Relief where period of grace is provided for the payment of the rent.— Where the lease itself privodes for a period of grace for payment of the rent which may become due, there is a difference of opinion on the question whether the Court can grant relief against the forfeiture.

On the one hand, it has been held that relief should not be granted in such cases.[1] This view proceeds on the ground that the principle of granting relief against forfeiture is that a clause for forfeiture is regarded in equity as merely being in terrorm intended merely to safeguard the due payment of rent, that where the lessee is given a period of grace after default, for making the payment, it cannot be said that the clause of forfeiture was intended to be merely in terrorem, and that therefore relief need not be given in such cases.

On the other hand, the contrary view has been taken in other cases,[2] namely, that the equitable principle being to grant relief against forfeiture, it is not affected by the insertion of a clause granting a period of grace.

It is submitted that the latter view is to be preferred. The clause providing days of grace is inserted for the benefit of the lessee, and as pointed out by Napier, J., in the undermentioned case[3] it is difficult to see how what was intended as a benefit to the lessee can be made use of to deprive the Court of its power to grant relief.

9. Consent decree creating relation of lessor and lessee and providing for forfeiture on non-payment of rent—Relief.—In Wentworth v. Bullen[1] Baron Parke observed :

> "The contract of the parties is not the less a contract and subject to the incidents of a contract because there is superadded the command of the Judge."

Where, therefore, a consent decree creates the relation of landlord and tenant and provides for forfeiture on non-payment of rent, the Court can give relief against the forfeiture in the same way as it can do in a lease created by act of parties.[2]

10. Suit for ejectment on forfeiture—Court, if can pass decree for arrears of rent only.—It is clear from the section that unless the lessee pays or tenders the rent in arrear or gives security therefor at the hearing of the suit, the suit for ejectment will be decreed. In the undermentioned case,[1] however, it was held that in appropriate cases, the Court may refuse a decree for ejectment, and may merely pass a decree for the arrears of rent. It is submitted that this view is not correct. The provisions of this section were not referred to in the said decision.

11. Relief against forfeiture for breaches of other conditions.—This section in limited to forfeiture for non-payment of rent. There is no provision for relief being granted against forfeiture for breaches of conditions other than non-payment of rent. No relief can therefore be granted in such cases.[1] But in cases of conditions other than conditions against assigning, sub-letting, parting with possession, or disposing of the property leased, S. 114A requires that the lessor should give notice to the lessee requiring him to remedy the breach if it is capable of remedy, and if the breach is remedied within a reasonable time of notice, the lessee cannot be ejected.

A forfeiture for breach of a condition against alienation cannot be relieved against under this section,[2] nor does S. 114A apply to the case.

Forfeiture under decree—Construction of decree.—Where the first Court decreed relief against forfeiture on payment of a certain amount which was paid, and the appellate Court thereafter granted an additional amount to the plaintiff to be paid within "one month from this date," confirming the first Court's decree in other respects, it was held that in construing the decree the Court ought to have acted in favour of the tenant against forfeiture rather than in the landlord's favour and that the failure to pay the additional amount within one month of the first Court's decree did not cause forfeiture of the tenancy, in view of the doubtful wording of the decree.[1]

1. Scope of the section.—Under the English law as it stood prior to 1881, Courts of Equity granted relief against forfeiture of leases only in cases of non-payment of rent and not in other cases.[1] By the Conveyancing Act of 1881 (44 & 45 Vict., Ch. 41) S. 14, provision was made for the grant of relief against every forfeiture for the breach of any condition whatsoever in a lease other than conditions against assigning, underlying, parting with possession or disposing of the property leased, conditions for forfeiture on the bankruptcy of the lessee and conditions for forfeiture on the taking in execution of the lessee's interest.[2]

2. Sub-section (1) of S. 14 of the Conveyancing Act of 1881 runs as follows :

"Section 14 (1). A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease, for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease, shall not be enforceable, by action or otherwise, unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of and, if the breach is capable of remedy, requiring the lessee to remedy the breach, and, in any case, requiring the lessee to make compensation in money for the breach, and the lessee fails, within a reasonable time thereafter, to remedy the breach, if it is capable of remedy, and to make reasonable compensation in money, to the

The Indian Legislature in enacting S. 114 enabling Courts to grant relief against forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and in not providing for other cases, preferred to adhere to the old English law and not to the provisions of the Conveyancing Act of 1881.[3] No relief could therefore be granted under the Act against forfeiture of leases except in cases of non-payment of rent. In cases not governed by the Act (e. g., agricultural leases), however, the Courts granted relief on equitable principles against forfeiture even in cases other than non-payment of rent.[4]

Section 146 of the English Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V, Ch. 20) which replaced the old S. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, gave much wider powers of granting relief against forfeiture of leases. Even breaches of conditions against assignment, sub-letting, etc., could be relieved against if the breach occurred after the passing of the Act.[5]

The present S. 114A was introduced in this Act by the amending Act of 1929 and is modelled on S. 14 of the English Conveyancing Act, 1881.[5aa] Even after the enactments of S. 114A it has been held that the court can grant relief against forfeiture of an agricultural lease on equitable grounds. Thus it will grant relief even when the notice of forfeiture is not in acceptance with the section as the section only embodies an equitable principle which the court can apply in such a case.[5b] lessor may re-enter" show that the section applies only to cases falling within cl. (1) of S. 111 (g). It thus excludes from its operation forfeitures on the ground of denial of title[5a] and forfeiture on the insolvency of the lessee falling within cls. (2) and (3) of S. 111 (g). Even in cases falling within cl. (1) of S. 111 (g), the last paragraph of this section execludes from its operation a forfeiture for non-payment of rent (which is separately provided for by S. 114) and forfeiture for breach of a condition against assigning, sub-letting, parting with possession or disposing of the property leased. The creation of a usufructuary mortgage does not amount to an assignment.[5bb] Where a lease contained a covenant that the land should not be given as security for any pecuniary obligation of the lessee and the lessee granted a usufructuary mortgage of the property to secure a loan it was held that the lessee has incurred a forfeiture of the lease.[5c]

2. Notice before suit for ejectment.—Under S. 111 (g) it is necessary for the determination of the lease for breach of a condition that the lessor should give a notice in writing to the lessee of his intention to determine the lease. This section provides that after the determination of the lease under S. 111 (g), it is necessary for the lessor, before suing for ejectment to serve on the lessee a notice containing the particulars mentioned in the section. The object of this notice is merely to give the lessee an opportunity even after the determination of the lease to remedy the breach if he can and continue the lease. It seems to be clear, therefore, that in cases of breaches of conditions referred to in this section, two notices are necessary to be given before the lessor can maintain a suit for ejectment. He must first give a notice of his intention to determine the lease and, after the determination of the lease in pursuance of such notice, he must give a further notice as required by this section before suing for ejectment. It has, however, been held by the High Court of Calcutta in the undermentioned case[1] that a single notice is sufficient. According to the decision this section merely defines the form in which the notice under S. 111 (g) is to be issued in cases where the breach of the condition is capable of being remedied. It is submitted that this view is not correct for the reasons stated above.

3. Contents of notice.—The provisions as to the particulars required to be given in the notice have been reproduced from S. 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and S. 146 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, with this difference, however, that the notice under the latter provisions should also require the lessee, in any case, to make reasonable compensation for the breach.

The object of the notice is to give the lessee precise information of what is alleged against him and what is demanded of him.[1] The notice "specifying the particular breach complained of," therefore, must not specify the breach complained of merely by reference to the particular covenant broken but must give sufficient details to enable the lessee to understand with reasonable certainty, what he is required to do to remedy the breach. Where a number of houses were let with a covenant to "keep them in good condition and complete tenantable repairs" and on a breach thereof a notice was served upon the lessee in the following words "I hereby give you notice that you have broken the covenants for repairing the inside and outside of the houses contained in the lease and I require you to repair them forthwith," it was held that there was nothing in the notice to show in respect of which house the breach had been committed and that the notice was, therefore, not a valid one.[2]

Where a breach of more conditions than one is complained of, a notice to remedy those breaches is not bad merely because in respect of one or more of them the breach cannot be established.[3]

Where two covenants are broken and a notice in respect of only one of them is given and afterwards that breach is waived, the lessor cannot take advantage of the notice in respect of the other breach.[4]

As to what time will be "reasonable" for remedying the breach complained of will depend upon circumstances of each case. In the undermentioned case[5] where a vast number of repairs were to be made and a suit for ejectment was filed only two days after the service of notice upon the lessee, it was held that reasonable time had not been allowed to remedy the breach.

Where the notice served upon the lessee does not give him an opportunity of remedying the breach where it is capable of being remedied the lessor cannot maintain the suit for ejectment.[6]

115. The surrender, express or implied, of a lease of immovable property does not prejudice an under-lease of the property or any part thereof previously granted by the lessee, on terms and conditions substantially the same (except as regards the amount of rent) as those of the original lease; but, unless the surrender is made for the purpose of obtaining a new lease, the rent payable by, and the contracts binding on, the under-lessee shall be respectively payable to and enforceable by the lessor.

Effect of surrender and forfeiture on under-leases.

The forfeiture of such a lease annuls all such under-leases except where such forfeiture has been procured by the lessor in fraud of the under-lessees, or relief against the forfeiture is granted under section 114.

1. Scope of the section.—A lease is a transfer of an interest in immovbale property. Under S. 108, cl. (j) the lessee can, in the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, transfer his interest by way of sub-lease. The sub-lessee's interest being carved out of the lessee's interest, it will as a general rule be determined by the determination of the lease itself[1] in accordance with the maxim cessante statu primitivo, cessat derivativus (the derived estate ceases on the determination of the original estate). Thus, if the lease is determined by efflux of time or by forfeiture or by operation of law the sub-lease will also be determined.[2]

A determination by surrender of the lease by the lessee is an exception to this general rule. A surrender being a voluntary act on the part of the lessee, the principle that a man cannot derogate from his own grant will come into play, and the lessee's action will not be allowed to prejudice the sub-lessee.[3] This principle was recognised in England from very early times.[4] Lord Coke, after noticing that as between the parties to a surrender the estate is absolutely drowned, said : "But having regard to strangers who were not parties or privies thereunto (lest, by a voluntary surrender they may receive prejudice touching any right or interest they had before the surrender), the estate surrendered hath, in consideration of law, a continuance."

A disclaimer by trustee in bankruptcy of the lease, will, it appears, have the same effect. Thus in the undermentioned English decision[4a] where a purchaser had agreed to by an under lease and on the head lessee's becoming bankrupt the trustee disclaimed the lease it was held that the disclaimer did not entirely extinguish the lease ; if only operated to determine the head lessee's interest in the lease and therefore the interest of the purchaser could he described as an under lease.

2. Surrender for obtaining new lease.—It has been seen already that a valid surrender of a head lease obliterates it and establishes direct contract between the under-lessee and the original lessor. The exception to this rule is, where the surrender is made for the purpose of obtaining a new lease. In the latter case, the benefits of the contract of under-lease and the right to the rent thereunder vest in the lessee whether he is the original lessee or his nominee.[1]

3. Sub-lease put an end to by forfeiture.—A forfeiture of a lease will, unlike a surrender thereof, destroy the sub-lease on the general principle that a derivative estate will fall with the determination of the original estate. (See Note 1.) But where such forfeiture is procured by the lessor in fraud of the under-lessee it will not have any operation against the under-lessee.[1a] Where the landlord acquires a right to enact his tenant under S. 7 of the Madras Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act (XV L 15) of 1946) after giving a notice to quit under the provision of the Transfer of Property Act, the sub-tenant is liable to be evicted.[1b]

An implied surrender under S. 25 (4) of the C. P. Tenancy Act, 1898, has been held to be analogous to a forfeiture which would put an end to the sub-lease in the absence of fraud or collusion.[1]

Where relief against forfeiture is granted under S. 114, the rights of lessee remain as if the forfeiture had not occurred. Consequently, the under-lessee's rights also are not affected. The section does not refer to cases where a forfeiture is relieved under S. 114A. There does not seem to be any reason why the same principle should not apply to such cases.

4. Agricultural leases.—The section does not in terms apply to agricultural leases. The effect of a surrender or of a forfeiture of such leases on under-leases must be determined by reference to the local laws, or custom, if any, governing the particular transaction[1] and in the absence thereof, by reference to the general principles underlying this section.[2] On the principles stated in Note 1 a voluntary surrender, even in the case of an agricultural lease will not put an end to a valid under-lease,[3] while a forfeiture will put an end to it.[4]

1. Scope of the section.—Whenever after the determination of a lease the lessee remains in possession, he is said to "hold over."[1] This section deals with the effect of "holding over" by a lessee with the Consent of the lessor. Where there is a fresh contract of lease entered into after the expiry of the original lease, it is evident, that this section will not apply.[1a]

Before the passing of this Act, it had been held that a tenant holding over after the expiration of his tenancy must be presumed to hold on the same terms as those of the original lease.[1b]

Under the English law, a tenant who continues in possession after the determination of the tenancy without the agreement or disagreement of the person in whom the right of possession resides is said to be a tenant by sufferance.[2] The difference between a tenancy by sufferance under the English law and a tenant holding over under this Act, is this : In the former case the consent of the lessor to such possession converts the lessee into a tenant at will except in cases where the original lease was itself for a year, in which case the tenant becomes a tenant from year to year.[3] In this country, the consent of the lessor does not convert the tenant holding over into a tenant at will but converts him into a tenant from year to year or from month to month as the case may be. Except for this distinction the nature of a tenancy by sufferance in English law and the nature of the possession of a person holding over appears to be the same.

A tenancy by holding over or a tenancy by sufferance is merely a fiction to avoid continuance of possession operating as a trespass. It cannot therefore be created by contract, and arises only by implication of law when a person who has been in possession under a lawful title continues in possession after that title has determined without the consent of the person entitled.[4]

The effect of holding over with the consent of the lessor under this section is, firstly, that in the absence of an agreement to the contrary the lease is renewed as to all terms except the duration of the lease, and, secondly, that the duration of the renewed lease is from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose for which the property is leased as specified in section 106.[5]

It is the assent of the lessor or his legal representative that effects a renewal of the lease under this section.[6] The lessee's assent is not necessary.[7] The tenancy created under this section is a new tenancy though many of the terms of the old lease may be continued in the new lease by implication and therefore by the lessee continuing in possession after the determination of the old lease there is an offer on the part of the lessee which has to be accepted by the lessor by giving his assent if a new tenancy is to arise under the section.[7a] that there existed a relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. Where there was no contract of tenancy between the parties, this section has no application.[7b]

This chapter, and therefore this section, does not apply to leases for agricultural purposes (see S. 117) but the principle underlying it has been applied to such leases on the ground of justice, equity and good conscience, in the absence of any special reason for not doing so.[8]

The Act has not been made applicable to N. W. F. P. and[8a] the Punjab but the principle of this section has been applied to cases arising in that Province.[9] for the rent of the whole month.[1] There must, however, be a continuity of possession by the lessee without any break at the determination of the original lease.[2] If after the determination of the lease, the lessee is dispossessed by the lessor and is again afterwards admitted on the property by him, there can be no renewal of the old lease under this section.[3]

Where a tenant remained in possession in disobedience of the direction by the House Rent Controller to give possession of the house to the landlord by a certain date under the provinces of Madras Buildings (Lease and Rent Control) Act, 1946 it was held that he was not a person remaining in possession within the meaning of this section but was wrongfully remaining in possession and acceptance of rent by the landlord did not create a new tenancy.[4]

3. More lessees than one—Only some remaining in possession—Effect of.—Where there are more lessees than one and only some of them remain in possession without the consent of others, the lease is renewed only in favour of such of them as remain in possession. There is no renewal in favour of the rest and consequently they are not liable for rent for the period during which the others remained in possession after the determination of the lease.[1] So also where a single lessee creates a number of under leases and the lessor accepts rents from one or more of the under lessees remaining in possession after determination of the head lease, this section will apply and there will be a renewal in favour of those from whom the lessor accepts rent.[2]

4. Effect of lessee's legal representative remaining in possession.—This section will apply only when the lessee remains in possession after the determination of the lease and such possession is assented to by the lessor. Where, therefore, the lease terminates by the death of the lessee the latter's legal representative cannot be said to be a lessee and the consent of the lessor to his remaining in possession will not, under this section, operate as a renewal of the lease in his favour.[1] The position will, however, be different where the lessee dies during the continuance of the lease and his legal representative enjoys the lease for the rest of the period of the lease, and after its determination remains in possession with the assent of the lessor. In such a case, the position of the legal representative would be that of the lessee himself and there would be a renewal in his favour as provided for by this section.[2] Again where, there has already been a renewal of the expired lease in favour of the lessee himself and afterwards his representative comes in possession of the property, there is nothing in the section to preclude him from getting the benefit of the renewal.[3]

In Vadappalli Narasimham v. Sitarammurti,[4] A continued in possession after the expiry of his lease but without the consent of the lessor. He then died and his legal representative continued in possession. It was held that the legal representative of A was a mere trespasser when he entered into possession and the lessor could not by his assent effect a renewal of the original lease under this section. See also the undermentioned case[5] to the same effect.

5. Legal representative of the lessor.—The term "legal representative" is not defined in the Act. But it clearly implies a person who occupies the same position as the lessor.[1] A grants a lease to B who in turn sub-lets the property to C. After the determination of B's lease, C continues in possession. A leases the same property to D who accepts rent from C. D, who holds only a fraction of the interest held by A, cannot be called his legal representative as he (D) is not in the same position as A. Acceptance of rent by him from C, therefore, does not renew the lease of C.[2]

6. "Accepts rent or otherwise assents to his continuing in possession."—
—The section clearly shows that the consent, express or implied, of the lessor has to be shown before the lessee is entitled to a renewal.[1] The acceptance of rent is only one form of the assent of the lessor to the lessee's remaining in possession of the property.[1a] But the acceptance must be of rent as such[2] and must be voluntary.[3] Further, the payment of the rent by the lessee must be in the capacity which he held under the original lease. If he pays rent in the assertion of some other capacity, then the acceptance of such payment will not have the effect of renewing the lease.[3a]

Mere acceptance of rent would not amount to a conclusive proof of such assent. Thus where the lessee after the determination of the lease remained in possession against the the will of the lessee and the rent for a period subsequent to the determination of the lease was accepted long before the determination it was held that such acceptance would not amount to a conclusive proof of the assent by the lessor to his continuing at possession.[3b] Where the acceptance of rent by the landlord could be attributed either to the tenants' becoming a statutory tenant under the provisions of Bombay Rents, Hotel Rates and Lodging House Rates (control) Act, 1944 on to the landlord's agreeing to a new tenancy under this section it was held that in order to show that a new tenancy had been created under this section it must be shown that the acceptance of rent was attributable to his asserting to a new tenancy.[3c]

When the lessor accepts the payment as rent any subsequent protest by him cannot alter the legal consequences of acceptance under this section.[3d]

Mere delay[4] or passive failure,[5] on the part of the lessor in taking steps to eject a lessee who remains on the property after the determination of the lease does not by itself amount to an assent on the part of the lessor to the lessee's remaining in possession of the property.

A notice desiring the tenant "to quit the premises which you hold under me, your term therein having long since expired" does not indicate that the lessee was in possession with the assent of the lessor after the expiry of his lease.[6]

7. More lessors than one—Acceptance by one only.—Where there are more lessors than one and one of them accepts rent from the tenant with respect to his share in the property, the lease is renewed in respect of that lessor's share only.[1]

8. Clause for enhancement of rent in a quit notice, whether amounts to an assent.—If in a notice to quit, the lessor, alternatively asks the lessee to pay an enhanced rent, there can be no doubt that the lessor assent to the lessee remaining in possession on payment of the enhanced rent; but if he asks for an enhanced rent not alternatively but by way of penalty, such demand for an enhanced rent cannot be construed to be an assent on his part to the possession of the lessee on payment of such rent. Thus, where the clause in the quit notice was: "In default of so vacating I write this, with a pure mind, that Rs. 75 per month will be collected from the tenancy along with the costs of Court," it was held that no consent on the part of the lessor could be inferred from the clause.[1]

9. Suit for rent for the period of lessee's possession after determination, whether amounts to assent.—Where after the determination of a lease, the lessee remains in possession and there is nothing to indicate that the lessor declined to consent to the continuance of possession, the institution by him of a suit for the rent of such period amounts to an assent on his part;[1] but where there are clear indications to show the dissent of the lessor, no consent on his part can be inferred from a suit for rent of such a period.[2]

10. Clause for renewal.—If there is a clause for renewal in the original lease but after the determination thereof no fresh lease is formally executed under the covenant for renewal, but the lessee remains in possession with the assent of the lessor, he can claim the benefit of this section.[1] The agreement to grant a further lease is not an "agreement to the contrary" within the meaning of this section. At the same time, the section does not mean that the continuance in possession by the lessee with the lessor's consent will cause a renewal of the lease for the period mentioned in the renewal clause. The renewal under the section is only from month to month or from year to year, as the case may be, according to the purpose of the lease. What then is the effect of the renewal clause when the lessee continues in possession with the lessors's consent? If the lessee has exercised his option of obtaining a further lease (no particular form is necessary for exercising the option unless the agreement provides otherwise) he will have, besides his rights under S. 116, all the rights of a person who has been let into possession of the property under an agreement to grant a lease of such property for the period mentioned in the renewal clause. His rights in the latter role will not amount to an actual lease in his favour like the one that is created under this section. But, nevertheless, the lessee may, in certain circumstances, be entitled, under such rights, to retain possession of the property for the period of the lease agreed to be granted (and not only to a lease from month to month or from year to year terminable by notice under this section). As to the rights of a person in possession of property under an agreement for the transfer of such property, see S. 53A and Notes thereunder. If for any reason, the agreement has to be disregarded, the lessee can fall back upon his rights under this section.[2]

A lease for a term of years provided that the lessee was to deliver possession of the property at the expiry of the term without any notice to quit and in case the lessee failed to deliver possession and "held over," he was liable to pay rent at double the rate till he delivered possession. It was held that the clause did not confer on the lessee an option to continue in possession after the expiry of the term and that it was merely a penal clause.[3]

See also section 111, Note 3.

11. "In the absence of an agreement to the contrary."—The agreement to the contrary may be express or implied.[1] The expression "in the absence of an agreement to the contrary" must be taken to mean an agreement as to the terms of the holding over. Where there has been no such agreement inconsistent with the tenancy by holding over being from month to month or from year to year, then such tenancy is created whatever the terms of the original lease. Thus, the fact that the original lease reserves an annual rent is no objection to holding that the tenancy by holding over under the section is one from month to month where the purpose of the lease is not agricultural or manufacturing. Nor does this fact imply an agreement that the tenancy by holding over should be one from year to year.[2] Similarly, the fact that the original lease contains a clause that the lessee may be ejected without notice is no ground for holding that notice as per Ss. 106 and 116 is not necessary for determining the new tenancy by holding over that arises by the tenant continuing in possession with the lessor's assent.[3] The argument that the reservation of annual rent in the original lease implies an agreement that the tenancy by holding over is one from year to year is based on the rule that "the mode in which rent is expressed to be reserved affords the presumption that the tenancy is of a character corresponding thereto," i. e., if rent is to be paid annually there is the presumption of annual tenancy.[4] But this rule is not of universal application and the presumption of yearly lease does not always arise from the fact of an annual payment of rent.[5]

See also Note 10.

12. Effect of renewal.—The effect of a renewal under the section is that there comes into existence a new lease between the parties[1] but the renewal is, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, on the same terms as those contained in the expired lease[2] except as to the duration of the lease. This is, however, subject to one qualification that, if any statutory provisions have come in existence in the meanwhile (i. e., before the renewal) the terms of the renewed lease may be affected thereby.[3] Also if the lessor had waived any of the conditions in the old lease during its existence he will not be entitled to enforce such a condition against the lessee after renewal.[4]

The duration of a renewed lease by virtue of this section will be from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of it and not that of the original lease.[5] Thus, if a land is leased for three years for keeping a shop and after the expiry of the period the lease is renewed under this section, the renewal will be not for three years more but only from month to month.[6]

The renewal being from year to year or from month to month according to the purpose of the lease, as specified in S. 106, it will be necessary for either party to the renewed lease, if he desires to determine it, to give notice to the other party according to the provision of section 106.[7]

But notwithstanding that the possession of the tenant holding over is wrongful, it is not adverse to the owner.[6] In Mt. Allah Rakhi v. Shah Mohammad,[7] where the defendant in a suit for possession pleaded that his possession had been adverse to the plaintiff for the statutory period and at the same time relied upon Art. 139 of the Limitation Act[8] as barring the plaintiff's suit, their Lordships of the Privy Council observed as follows : " it may be noted at once that the appellant's plea of adverse possession is obviously inconsistent with the application of Art. 139 which relates to the case of a landlord suing to recover possession from a tenant. " It has accordingly been held that where a tenant holds over, for a period of twelve years from the determination of the tenancy, without the landlord's assent he acquires under S. 28 of the Limitation Act, a title to the property, not by reason of his possession having been adverse for a period of twelve years but by reason of the efflux of time limited under Art. 139 of the Limitation Act.[9] It has also been held that tenant holding over has a position recognised by law and can unlike a trespasser, sue under S. 9 of the Specific Relief Act, if he is dispossessed otherwise than in due course of law.[10] The proposition that a tenant's possession after the determination of the tenancy is not adverse to the landlord would seem to be based on the ground that the principle set forth in Billaskunwar v. Deshraj Aanjitsingh,[11] viz., that a tenant who has been let into possession cannot deny his landlord's title so long as he has not openly restored possession by surrender to his landlord, is applicable also to cases where the tenancy has determined.[12]

In the undermentioned cases[13] it has been held that possession of a tenant holding over is not wrongful. It has also been held in some cases[14] that such possession is adverse to the landlord. It is submitted that neither of these views is correct.

1. Legislative changes.

(1) The words "with the previous sanction of the Governor-General Council" after the words "Local Government" were omitted by S. 2 and Sch. I of the Devolution Act, 1920 (XXXVIII of 1920).

(2) The words "in the case of all or any of such leases" after the words "so applicable" are new and were inserted by S. 6 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1904 (VI of 1904).

2. Scope of the section.—Prior to this Act, no distinction was made between agricultural and non-agricultural leases[1] and the general principles of English law relating to leases were applied to them as being in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience.[1a] This section, however, exempts leases for agricultural purposes from the provisions of this chapter, unless they are made applicable by notification by the Provincial Government.[1b] The object of the Legislature, in excepting agricultural leases from the operation of the provisions of this chapter was to retain in force the special provisions relating to the class of leases dealt with in the various local Rent Acts, and which may be compendiously described as leases for agricultural purposes.[2] In their Report of 1879, the Law Commissioners observed:

> "Local legislation as to the relations of zemindar and raiyat being so copious and elaborate, we think, that the provisions of this chapter should not apply to leases for agricultural purposes, except in so far as the Local Government may declare all or any of such provisions to be so applicable, together with, or subject to, those of any local law for the time being in force."[3]

But, in the absence of any law, usage or custom to the contrary, the principles of this chapter which merely reproduces the well-established rules of English law, have been held applicable to leases for agricultural purposes as rules of justice, equity and good conscience.[4] As observed by Wallis, C.J., in Krishna Shetti v. Gilbert Pinto[5]:

> "The Act (i.e., the Transfer of Property Act) was framed by eminent English lawyers to reproduce the rules of English law in so far as they are of general application and rest on principle as well as authority, and its provisions are, in my opinion, binding on us as rules of justice, equity and good conscience, when we have to deal with agricultural leases in the absence of any special reason for not applying them. The Legislature wisely, in my opinion, if I may say so, has refrained from making these sections (i.e., Ss. 105 to 116) applicable proprio vigore to agricultural leases for fear of unnecessarily interfering with settled usages which it is undesirable to disturb. But in the absence of special reasons, there is no ground for applying a different rule in the cases of agricultural leases."

Thus, the principles of the following provisions have been applied to agricultural leases:

(AA) Section 106 ([5aa])

3. "Agricultural purposes."—"Agriculture," according to the Oxford English Dictionary is "the science and art of cultivating the soil, including the allied pursuits of gathering in the crops and rearing live-stock; tillage; husbandry; farming (in the widest sense)."[1] According to Webster's Dictionary, "agriculture" means "the act or science of cultivating the ground including harvesting of crops and rearing and management of live-stock; tillage; husbandry; farming; in a broader sense, the science and art of the production of plants and animals useful to man including to a variable extent the preparation of these products for man's use. In this broad use it includes farming, horticulture and forestry together with such subjects as butter and cheese making, sugarmaking, etc."[2] It is thus clear that the term has two meanings: one wide and the other limited.

Section 117 Note 3

1. Murray, Oxford English Dictionary, cited in ('02) 25 Mad 627 (629) (DB), King-Emperor v. Alexander Allan.
2. Webster, New International Dictionary, 1918 Edition.

According to its wide meaning the term will include horticulture, forestry and even the use of land for pasture.[3] According to its limited but commonly understood meaning, it is confined to the raising of grain or other field crops. In this Act itself there is nothing to indicate that it is intended to limit the denotation of the term in any way[4] and the decisions have interpreted the term as including horticulture.[5]

In Murgesa Chetti v. Chinnathambi Goundan,[6] Bhashyam Ayyangar, J., defined "agriculture" as including "not only all field cultivation by tillage, but also all garden cultivation for the purpose chiefly of procuring vegetables or fruits as food for man or beast and other products fit for human consumption by way of luxury if not as an article of diet." This definition, while it is wide enough to include horticulture, excludes such useful cultivation as cotton, indigo, tobacco, jute, flower, etc. In Raja of Venkatagiri v. Ayyappa Reddi[7] and Seshayya v Raja of Pittapur,[8] Sadasiva Ayyar, J., defined "agriculture" as meaning "the raising of annual or periodical grain crops through the operation of ploughing, sowing, etc." This definition too is very narrow as it excludes other field crops like sugarcane, indigo, cotton, etc. In Pavadai Pathan v. Ramaswami Chetti[9] Spencer, J., disapproved of the above definitions and observed:

> "Agriculture connotes the raising of useful or valuable products which derive nutriment from the soil with the aid of human skill and labour, and thus it will include horticulture, arboriculture and sylviculture in all cases where the growth of trees is effected by the expenditure of human care and attention in such operation as those of ploughing, sowing, palnting, manuring, watering, protecting, etc." Even this definition, though wider than the other definitions, is not wide enough to include all that is suggested by the broader definition given by the Oxford Dictionary and Webster's Dictionary and which meaning it is conceived, has to be adopted for deciding what are and what are not agricultural purposes within the meaning of this section.

It is only a lease for agricultural purposes that is exempted from the operation of the provisions of this chapter. It is not the actual use of the land, but the original purpose of the tenancy which determines the question of applicability or otherwise of the Act.[9a] A lease which relates to agricultural land is not necessarily one for agricultural purposes. Thus, a lease granted to a rent farmer or middle man is not one for agricultural purposes though it relates to agricultural land.[10] So also a lease which enables or requires the lessee to sub-let the land for the purpose of bringing it under cultivation is not a lease for agricultural purpose.[10a] On the other hand a lease for agricultural purpose is not confined to one for cultivation of the land. A purpose may be connected with agriculture but not necessarily with cultivation.[11] Thus, a lease of land to be used as a yard for ploughing cattle, or stocking hay for such cattle, or for the purpose of storing manure, or crops, or for growing plants to be used as manure for agriculture, or as a habitation to agriculturists will be a lease for agricultural purposes.[12] So also a lease of land for the purpose of grazing the ploughing cattle.[13]

Whether a particular lease is for agricultural purpose must be determined with reference to what the primary object of the lease is. If the primary object of the lease is a purpose relating to agriculture, the lease will be one for an "agricultural purpose,"[14] otherwise not. Thus, a lease, the primary object of which is the user of the property for residential purposes, is not one for agricultural purposes merely because the lessee has also a right to cultivate or raise trees in the compound.[15] Similarly, where the primary object of a lease by a zamindar was merely to secure the proprietary rights of the lessor and not the user of any land for agriculture, though it was open to the lessee to cultivate the land if he so desired, it was held that the lease was not one for agricultural purposes.[15a] Where by a mukanari lease the lessor handed over his entire rights including even the underground rights to the lessee it was held that the object of the lessor was not to grant a lease for agricultural purposes but to hand over his proprietary rights to the lessee.[15b]

The following have been held to be leases for agricultural purposes:

(1) A lease for growing casuarina trees.[16]

Under the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901,[17] and the Madras Estates Land Act, 1908,[18] however, a lease for growing timber or fuel or for a grove has been held to be not one for agricultural purposes.

(2) A reclamation lease granted for the purpose of removing the jungle and bringing the land under cultivation.[19]

(3) A lease for rearing tea plants. The fact that a small portion of the land leased is occupied by a factory for manuturing tea does not change its character.[20]

(4) A lease for working of lac-bearing trees.[21]

TOPIC INDICATOR

Family arrangement is not exchange. See Note 4.
Pre-emption on exchange. See Note 3 and Section 120, Note 2.

1. Scope of the section.—The Contract Act, 1872, enacted in Chap. VII thereof provisions relating to the sale of goods. No provisions were enacted as to the exchange of goods. With a view to remedy this defect, this chapter on exchanges has been made to include not only exchanges of immovable property, but also moveable property. While however, an agreement for sale of moveable property will, under the provisions of the Contract Act, transfer the title to the property in certain circumstances, an agreement for the exchange of immovable property will not, under this section, transfer the title in the property. There must be an actual transfer of ownership. "We would define 'exchange' ", said the Law Commissioners in their Report of 1879, "not as an agreement, but as the fulfilment of an agreement by mutual transfer of dominion."

The definition of exchange given in this section has been founded on the provision contained in the New York Civil Code.[1]

2. Distinction between sale and exchange.—A sale is a transfer of ownership of property (not being money) for a price,[1] i.e., a sum of money which the transferor sets as the value of the property transferred.[2] In other words, a sale may be said to be a mutual transfer of ownership of one thing for the ownership of another, one of such things being the price of the other. An exchange, as defined in this section, is similar to a sale in so far as it is also a mutual transfer of ownership of one thing for the ownership of another, but it differs from a sale in that neither of the things transferred is the price of the other.[3]

Section 118—Note 2

1. Section 77 of the Contract Act, defines sale as "an exchange of property for a price"; Section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930, defines a contract of sale of goods as a contract "whereby the seller transfers or agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a price"; Section 54 of the Transfer of Property Act defines sale as the transfer of ownership for a price paid or promised or part paid and part promised.

(2) A gives B one hundred-rupee currency note and B gives one hundred rupees in coins in return. In this case also neither of the things transferred can be said to be the price of the other.[5] For the word price, which the vendor can charge at his pleasure for his property which is capable of fluctuations according to the rise and fall of the market, cannot be applied to the change of one form of money into another form of money, both forms being legal tender. The transaction is therefore an "exchange."

(3) A transfers field x to B in consideration of B paying Rs. 1,000 to A. This is a sale as the amount of Rs. 1,000 is the price of field x.

The distinction between a transfer by way of sale and a transfer by way of exchange thus lies in the nature of the consideration for such transfer.[6] If the consideration is the price of the property transferred it is a sale. But if it is property (not being price) then it is an exchange.

In all other respects an exchange is akin to a sale.[7]

Where the transaction otherwise amounts to an exchange, the fact that one of the parties to the transaction to sell the land which he takes in exchange after the exchange or that has contracted to do so before the exchange takes place does not affect the real nature of the transaction.[8]

3. Transfer of property partly for money and partly for other property —Nature of.—Where the consideration for a transfer of property is partly money and partly other property, and it is not possible to divide the transaction into separate transactions of sale and exchange, the question has arisen, especially in cases of pre-emption, whether the transaction is to be treated as a sale or an exchange, inasmuch as there is generally a right of pre-emption only where the transaction is a sale[1] though, if there is a custom to that effect, pre-emption is allowed even in cases of exchange.[1a] In the undermentioned case,[2] it has been held that the transaction would be an exchange and not a sale for the purposes of pre-emption and that this would be so even if the purpose of adding the non-pecuniary portion of the consideration is to defeat the the right of pre-emption. According to the Lahore High Court, on the other hand, a permanent transfer of property for a sum of money plus something that is not money, does not, merely because of such addition, cease to be a sale.[3] The question must be decided by looking at the substance of the transaction. A transfer which is in substance a sale cannot, according to that Court, be converted into an exchange by the mere addition of a non-pecuniary consideration to the price, so as to defeat the right of pre-emption. If the value of the non-pecuniary consideration forms only a negligible portion of the total consideration, the transaction would be a sale.[4] If the parties, in substance, intended to make an exchange of properties, the mere fact that a small sum of money was paid by one to the other by way of adjusting the values, would not alter the nature of the transaction as an exchange.[5] In the undermentioned case[6] where a house worth really Rs. 1,500 was transferred for land worth Rs. 500 and cash Rs. 500, the transaction was held to be an exchange.

4. Mutual transfer of ownership necessary.—A transaction A and B is not an exchange unless:—

(1) there is a transfer of ownership by A to B, and

(2) there is a transfer of ownership by B to A.[1]

Where a transaction does not constitute a transfer of property at all it cannot be an exchange. Thus, a transaction which is a family arrangement is not an exchange.[2] As seen in Note 4 on S. 5 such arrangements are merely acknowledgments of pre-existing titles and do not involve any transfer of property from one person to another. Where A allowed B to cultivate his occupancy holding x and B allowed A to cultivate his occupancy holding y each finding the land of the other more conveniently situated than his own but the record remained unchanged and each paid rent for the land he cultivated in the name of the other, it was held that there was no transfer of ownership, by the one to the other and that the transaction was not an exchange.[3]

Where there is a transfer of ownership by one of the parties only, and not by the other the transaction is not an exchange, as there is no mutual transfer of ownership. Thus, where A and B hold decrees against each other and settle their claims by a document under which A transfers a property to B, and B merely gives up his claim against A under his decree, there is no mutual transfer of ownership and the transaction is not an exchange.[4] Similarly, where A surrenders his lease-hold interest to his landlord in consideration of another lease given by the latter of other property, there is no mutual transfer of ownership, inasmuch as a surrender is merely acceleration of the reversion and not a transfer of any interest.[5] So also, where a husband transfers land to his wife for use by her during her life-time, and he gives up her right to future maintenance.[6]

5. Partition is not exchange.—As seen in Note 4 on S. 5, a partition of undivided property between cosharers or co-owners operates as a "transfer of property" within the meaning of this Act. Each sharer gives up in favour of the others his interests in the portions of the undivided property other than that which falls to his share. In this sense it may be said that a partition operates as a mutual transfer of property. But a partition is nevertheless not an "exchange" within the meaning of the section.[1] The reason for this view has been given by Ameer Ali, J., in Gyannessa v. Mobarakannessa"[2] as follows:

> "Section 118....is not applicable to cases where some of the co-owners possessing an undivided share in several properties take by arrangement a specific property in lieu of their shares in all. Section 118, as its language shows, refers to cases where two persons owning two specific properties transfer or convey their respective ownership one to the other".

The reason so given does not, it is submitted, express the principle correctly. In the under-mentioned case[3] where A and B were co-owners of property x, and B was the sole owner of property y, and B transferred to A property y in consideration for A giving up his rights in property x in favour of B, it was held by the same High Court that the transaction was an exchange. Though B in the case was the owner of the specific property y, A was not the owner of the property x and under the section as interpreted in Gyannessa's case[4] the transaction would not be an exchange.

The true reason seems to be that the transaction contemplated by the section is a mutual transfer brought about in pursuance of an agreement between the parties[5] and a partition is not such a transaction. The right to partition is a legal incident of undivided property and the effect of the definition and specification of the shares in pursuance of that right operates as a mutual transfer between the parties. The mutual transfer of property in such cases is brought about as a consequence of the definition and specification of shares which is a legal incident of undivided property, and not as a consequence of an agreement to transfer property.

Where, under a compromise decree, co-owners of undivided property took specific portions therein in lieu of their undivided interest in the whole property, it was held by the Patna High Court that the compromise did not amount to any transfer of property at all and was therefore not an exchange.[6] Their Lordships purported to follow the decision in Gyannessa's case referred to above, though, actually, in that case, it was held that a partition was not an exchange, notwithstanding it was a transfer of property.

6. Two sale deeds, if may constitute exchange.—The fact that two deeds, one by A in favour of B and the other by B in favour of A, are described as sale deeds, is not conclusive on the question whether they are really sale deeds or constitute an exchange. The question must be decided having regard to all the circumstances of the case.[1] Where the deeds form part of the same transaction, and no cash consideration passes between the parties, the deeds really constitute only a mutual transfer of ownership of one property for another, and therefore constitute only an exchange.[2] The fact that the value of the properties mutually transferred were fixed by the parties does not necessarily make the transaction mutual sales of property, for exchanges of properties are made always only having regard to their value.[3] It has been held by the High Court of Allahabad, that S. 92 of the Evidence Act does not, in view of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hanif-un-nissa v. Faiz-un-nissa,[4] preclude the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to show that two documents purporting to be separate sale deeds are in reality part and parcel of the same transaction.[5] A contrary view has been held by the High Court of Bombay in the undermentioned case.[6] It is submitted that the Allahabad view is correct.

7. "Ownership of one thing for the ownership of another."—A thing is not necessarily "property." Things which are res nullius are not property. It is only a thing which is the subject of ownership by a person that is, in law, "property". The words "ownership of a thing" in the section are merely equivalent to "property." But the expression "ownership of a thing" is used instead of the word "property" in view of the words "neither thing or both things being money only." It would be an inappropriate use of words to say "neither property or both properties being money only."

The word "thing" includes both tangible and intangible things. Thus, the transfer of a proprietary interest in certain land for the equity of redemption in respect of another land is an "exchange" within the meaning of this section.[1] So is the transfer of a debt in consideration of the transfer of the equity of redemption in certain property.[2] So also is the transfer of a right to enforce a charge for maintenance for the transfer of ownership of the property.[3] A right to sue or to take proceedings cannot be the subject of ownership and cannot be transferred. A transfer of property in consideration of the transferee forbearing to sue to set aside a certain sale is not a mutual transfer of property and is therefore not an exchange.[4]

8. "Both things being money only."—See Note 2.

9. Mode of effecting exchange.—The second paragraph of the section provides that an exchange of property can be made in the same manner as a sale of such property. Thus, where the property is "goods" as defined in the Sale of Goods Act, 1930, an exchange can be effected in the same manner as a sale of goods under that Act, namely, by a contract for the exchange of the goods. Such a contract may be made in writing, or by word of mouth or partly in writing and partly by word of mouth or may be implied from the conduct of the parties.

Where the property sought to be transferred in completion of exchange is immovable property, the formalities necessary to be observed under s. 54 for a sale of such property must be observed. Otherwise no title will pass to the transferee under the transfer. The use of the word "only" in the section excludes the possibility of title being acquired to immovable property within the statutory period by any other process than that laid down in the section.[1] Thus, in the case of tangible immovable property of the value of one hundred rupees and upwards, or in the case of a reversion or other intangible thing, the transfer by way of exchange can be made only by a registered instrument.[2] And in the case of tangible immovable property of a value less than one hundred rupees, a transfer by way of exchange can be made either by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property.[3] Under the old rule of Hindu law, a transfer of property need not be in writing.[4] The Act has, in this respect, abrogated the said rule.

An exchange may be effected by a single instrument. It is not necessary that there should be two separate deeds of transfer of property.[5] Where, however, two separate documents are executed, each party acquires a good title as soon as the particular document in his favour is executed and, where necessary, registered. Thus, if A and B agree to execute separate sale deeds by way of exchange, title will pass to B as soon as A has duly executed his deed in favour of B, notwithstanding that B has not executed a similar deed in favour of A.[6]

A deed which simply recities a transaction of exchange that has already taken place and provides for a penalty for failure to carry out the arrangement as agreed, is not itself a deed of exchange required to be executed in the manner provided for by this section.[7]

10. Remedy of parties to exchange.—On the completion, by mutual transfer, of the transaction of exchange, the right to the properties respectively transferred, becomes vested in the parties to whom they have been transferred, and the party who has failed to obtain possession must sue for possession of the property and not for the specific performance of a contract, for a completed transaction of exchange is an executed contract and not an executory one.[1]

Where A, one of the parties to a contract of exchange, has performed his part of the contract by executing a transfer of his property to B, the other party, but the latter has not done his part of the contract by executing a transfer of his property to A, A's remedy is only to sue B for the specific performance of the contract or for damages for breach of the contract. He cannot sue B for recovery of possession of the property transferred to B.[2]

Where neither party has performed his part of the contract by executing a transfer of his property in favour of the other, it is open to either of them to sue for the specific performance of the contract. But they are not obliged to sue for specific performance, and if one of the parties has been deprived of possession of his property by the other, the former is entitled to sue for a declaration of title to and for possession of the property.[3]

If any party to an exchange or any person claiming through or under such party is by reason of any defect in the title of the other party deprived of the thing or any part of the thing received by him in exchange, then, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the exchange, such other party is liable to him or any person claiming through or under him for loss caused thereby, or at the option of the person so deprived, for the return of the thing transferred, if still in the possession of such other party or his legal representative or a transferee from him without consideration.

Right of party deprived of thing received in exchange.

1. Legislative changes.—The old section ran as follows:

"In the absence of a contract to the contrary, the party deprived of the thing or part thereof he has received in exchange, by reason of any defect in the title of the other party, is entitled at his option to compensation or to the return of the thing transferred by him."

3. ('16) 3 AIR 1916 Cal 325 (326) : 33 Ind Cas 762 (DB), Jaharaddi Mandal v. Debnath.

The provision was defective in several respects. It related to the rights of a party deprived of the thing received in exchange, but did not provide for the rights of transferees from such party. Nor did it state whether the right could be exercised by the heirs of the party. It did not expressly state whether a return of the thing could be claimed by a party to the exchange against a transferee from the other party to the exchange. It gave a right to a party to a return of the thing transferred by him, but obviously the thing could not be returned unless the other party was in possession of it. The new section has now been framed so as to remove these defects.[1]

2. Scope of the section.—Under the old Common Law of England, there was implied in every exchange both a condition and a warranty as to title. The breach of the condition as to title gave a right of re-entry on the thing exchanged, and the breach of the warranty gave rise to a right to compensation for the damages sustained.[1] Further, the use of the word "give" or the word "grant" in any deed implied a covenant for title. By the Real Property Act, 1845,[2] it was provided that "an exchange or a partition of any tenements or hereditaments, made by deed executed after the 1st day of October 1845 shall not imply any condition in law; and the word 'give' or the word 'grant' in a deed, executed after the same day shall not imply any covenant in law, in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as the word 'give' or the word 'grant' may, by force of any Act of Parliament, imply a covenant." The Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V, Ch. 20), has re-enacted the above provision in a wider form, so as to include all conveyances of land.[3]

So far as sales of immovable property are concerned, the law in this country does not differ from the English law. No conditions are implied in a sale, and S. 55, sub-s. (2) provides for statutory covenants of title somewhat similar to those provided for by S. 76 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, in England. So far, however, as exchanges are concerned, this section has adopted the old English Common Law rule and implies both a condition and a warranty of title, the one giving rise to a right of re-entry on the thing exchanged and the other giving rise to compensation for damages sustained.[4]

A sale of movable property in this country as well as in England, implies, both a condition and a warranty as to title.[5]

This section is not applicable to the Punjab as the Transfer of Property Act has not been extended to it. But the principles of this section have been applied to cases arising in that Province.[6]

3. "Is by reason of any defect in the title of the other party deprived of the thing."—The deprivation contemplated by the section is an eviction by a title paramount.

It has been held in the undermentioned case[1] by the Lahore High Court that the deprivation must be a complete and permanent dispossession of the thing. Where, therefore, A and B exchanged certain properties, and the property got by A was entered upon by a mortgagee from B's brother under a mortgage given before the date of exchange, it was held that A's dispossession was not complete and permanent, that A was still owner of the property and that the section had therefore no application.

4. Defect in title does not ipso facto render completed exchange inoperative.—The mere fact that there is a defect in the title of one of the parties to the exchange, does not render a completed exchange inoperative. If the other party is deprived of the property by reason of such defect, he would have the remedy provided for by this section, namely, to the return of the thing transferred by him or to compensation, but until such deprivation the exchange remains valid.[1] Where the manager of a joint Hindu family exchanged family property with a third person, it was held that, assuming that the manager was not authorised to make the exchange by reason of its not being advantageous to the family, the exchange could not be considered to be inoperative as long as the transaction was not challenged by other members of the family.[2]

Where the title of a party to an exchange is initially defective, but subsequent to the exchange, such party acquires a full title to the property, the other party is, by virtue of S. 53, entitled to the benefit of such acquisition.[3]

5. Party deprived of the thing obtained in exchange—Nature of remedy.—The party deprived of the thing obtained by him in exchange, by reason of the defect of title to the other party, is entitled to two remedies in the alternative:

(a) Compensation from the other party for the loss caused by the deprivation of the property.

(b) Return of the thing transferred by him, if it is still in the possession of the other party or his legal representative or a transferee from him without consideration.

(A) Compensation.

The amount of compensation would ordinarily be the value of the property of which the party was deprived. If the property has been valued in the deed of exchange itself, such value would furnish a basis for fixing the amount of compensation.[1]

(B) Return of the thing.

The right to a return of the thing transferred by way of exchange implies a cancellation of the bargain, so as to place the parties in the position they were before the transaction. Where a party is deprived of a portion of the property got by him, he must, if he wishes to obtain return of the thing transferred by him, give up the portion of the thing got by him of which he was not deprived. He cannot retain such portion and ask for other property equivalent to the portion lost, for he cannot in such a case be said to have cancelled the bargain. If he retains such portion, his only remedy is to claim compensation for the loss of the other portion.[2]

Where the guardian of a minor exchanges his property for another, and he is subsequently deprived of the property got by him, the remedy of the minor is not to set aside the alienation, but to claim under this section that the thing transferred by the guardian should be returned to him or that he should be compensated for the loss.[3]

6. Party failing to get possession of property exchanged—Nature of remedy.—Where a transaction of exchange is completed, the right to the property exchanged becomes vested in the party to whom it has been transferred. His remedy, if the other fails to give him possession thereof, is to sue for possession on the basis of his title. He cannot sue for the specific performance of a contract, as, after a completed exchange, there is no executory contract of which specific performance can be ordered.[1]

7. Exchange void—Property, transferred, if can be got back.—Where properties have been mutually transferred by parties by way of exchange, and the exchange is for some reason void, either of them can ordinarily recover from the other the property transferred by him. But where the exchange is void as being prohibited by law, the parties are in pari delicto and the Court will help neither party in getting back his property from the other, the maxim applicable in such a case being "in pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" (in equal fault the condition of the possessor is more favourable.)[1]

8. A contrary intention appearing from the terms of the exchange.—The condition and warranty as to title is by virtue of this section implied in an exchange only where no contrary intention has been expressed in the terms of the exchange. In fact, the general rule regarding covenants in law is that they are intended to be operative only when the parties themselves have omitted to enter into any contract respecting the matters to which such covenants relate. The moment such a contract is entered into by the parties, the covenants in law cease to have any effect, even though the contract between the parties expressly provides only for some of the matters covered by the covenants in law and is silent as to the rest.[1] The principle that "an express covenant will do away the effects of all implied ones"[2] applies in such a case and the contract alone will regulate and govern the liabilities of the parties.[3] In Aspdin v. Austin[4] Lord Denman observed:

> "Where parties have entered into written engagements with expressed stipulations, it is manifestly not desirable to extend them by any implications; the presumption is that, having expressed some, they have expressed all conditions by which they intend to be bound under that instrument..... It is one thing for the Court to effectuate the intention of the parties to the extent to which they may have, even imperfectly, expressed themselves, and another to add to the instrument all such covenants as, upon a full consideration, the Court may deem fitting for completing the intentions of the parties, but which they, either purposely or unintentionally, have omitted. The former is but the application of a rule of construction to that which is written, the latter adds to the obligations by which the parties have bound themselves, and is, of course, quite unauthorized, as well as liable to great practical injustice in the application."

Thus, where in an exchange between X and Y, Y executed a security bond in favour of X binding himself to pay an amount not exceeding Rs. 4014-8-6 at the rate of Re. 1-4-0 per kuli for the land that might go out of X's possession, and X, being deprived of the land transferred to him, sued Y to recover his own land, it was held that the express terms of the above security bond superseded the rights of the parties under this section and hence X was not entitled to claim the return of the land given by him.[5]

The intention to abrogate the statutory implied covenant must, however, be clear and unambiguous. Where a clause in a deed of exchange was to the effect that "neither party would have any claim against the other contrary to the terms of the exchange," it was held that the clause did not amount to a clear expression of a contrary intention and did not take away the warranty implied by the section.[6]

9. Limitation for enforcement of remedy.—As has been seen in Note 2, this section implies a condition and a warranty as to title. A suit for a return of the thing exchanged can only be based on a breach of the condition as to title implied in the exchange, and will consequently be governed by Art. 143 of the Limitation Act.[1] A suit for compensation for the loss suffered by the deprivation of the thing exchanged is really a suit on a contract to indemnify and is governed by Art. 83 of the Limitation Act, or, where the exchange is by a registered document, by Art. 116 read with Art. 83 of that Act.[2]

sustained by the other, by giving him other property of equal value, a suit by A, on being deprived of his property, against B for compelling the latter to give him other property in performance of the contract is one for the specific performance of a contract and will be governed by Art. 113 of the Limitation Act.[3]

10. Retrospective operation of new section.—This section is not retrospective in its operation. It does not affect the terms and incidents of any exchange made or effected before the 1st April 1930 or any right, title, or obligation or liability acquired, created or incurred before such date.[1] Where the exchange was effected before 1st April 1930, but the deprivation of the thing exchanged by a party took place after 1st April 1930, the section that would govern the rights of parties would be the old section and not the new.[2]

In cases where the old section applies, it has been held by the Madras High Court that the remedy for return of the thing is available even against a bona fide purchaser for value from the other party to the exchange, on the ground that the transferee could have no better title than his transferor.[3] A contrary view has been taken by the Judicial Commissioner's Court of Nagpur[4] and by the High Court of Lahore,[5] namely that even under the old section, the remedy was not available against a bona fide purchaser for value.

So also it has been held in the undermentioned case[6] that the assignee of a party cannot maintain a suit against the other party for the return of the thing which his assignor had transferred to the other party, as the old S. 119 conferred rights on the party himself and not on the assignee.

1. Principle and scope.—As has been seen in Note 1 on S. 118, an exchange is, except in certain respects, akin to a sale. Each party to an exchange can be regarded as a buyer in respect of the thing he receives and as a seller in respect of the thing he parts with. It, therefore, naturally follows that each party should have the rights and be subject to the liabilities of a buyer in respect of the thing he receives and those of a seller in respect of the thing he parts with. The present section accordingly defines the rights and liabilities of each party to an exchange in terms of buyer and seller.[1]

Where the subject-matter of the exchange is immovable property, the rights and liabilities of the parties will be governed by S. 55. Where the subject-matter of the exchange is moveable property, the rights and liabilities of the parties will be governed by Chap. VII of the Contract Act (IX of 1872), which is now substituted by the Sale of Goods Act (III of 1930).

The rights and liabilities of the buyer and the seller under S. 55 are subject to contracts to the contrary, and the rights and liabilities of the buyer and seller under the Sale of Goods Act are subject not only to express contracts to the contrary but also to the course of dealing or usage to the contrary. (See S. 62 of the Sale of Goods Act.)

Where, in the city of Tuticorin, there was a custom among cotton dealers that dealers delivering cotton to owners of cotton presses with or without a special contract were entitled to get in return the same quality and weight of duly pressed clean cotton, it was held that so soon as the cotton was delivered to the owners of the press, the property in the cotton passed to them and that if it was destroyed by fire thereafter, they should bear the loss, and should pay to the dealers the price of the cotton delivered by them.[2]

2. Right of pre-emption on exchange.—It has been seen in Note 3 on S. 118 that an exchange is not a "sale" and that consequently no right of pre-emption can be claimed on the basis that the transaction is a sale. But the question arises whether the fact that under this section the liability of a party who takes in an exchange is his liability to the other in a sale, will enable a third person to claim a right of pre-emption against such party. It has been held that it will not.[1] The reason is that the rights and liabilities of the buyer and seller, referred to in the section are those which are enforceable inter se between them and not those which third parties may have against the parties to the sale. Consequently, the liability of a party who takes in an exchange is his liability to the other party to the exchange and not to any third party.[2]

3. Lien for the purchase-money.—Under S. 55, sub-s. (6), clause (b) a buyer is entitled to a charge on the property sold, for the amount of the purchase-money he has paid to the seller in anticipation of delivery. But in an exchange there cannot arise any question of payment of purchase-money and therefore no party can claim under this section a charge over other's property as provided for in S. 55, sub-S. (6), cl. (b).[1]

For the same reason a party to an exchange cannot invoke the principle of S. 55, sub-s. (4), cl. (b) and claim a charge for any money that may be due under such exchange.[2]

121. On an exchange of money, each party thereby warrants the genuineness of the money given by him.

Exchange of money.

Synopsis

1. Scope of the section.
2. "Money."

1. Scope of the section.—The general principle is that a person cannot convey to another any better title to a thing than he himself has to it.[1] The principle does not, however, apply to money which is legal tender. The mere delivery of money to a person conveys a perfectly valid and indefeasible title to it.[2] There is, therefore, no question, in an exchange of money, of any party being deprived of the thing by reason of any defect in the title of the other party, and there is, therefore, no scope for the applicability of S. 119 to such a case.

But a person who gives money as legal tender is, on general principles, answerable for the money being really a legal tender as it purports to be.[3] This is the principle that is found enacted in this section.

2. "Money."—"Money" does not include anything which is not legal tender. It includes current coin of the realm and all things which are "accustomably transferable in the country in the same manner as cash."[1] Badashahi coins of Baroda have not by law been made legal tender in British India and are therefore not "money" in British India.[2]

It has been held in the undermentioned case[3] that it is not necessary in order to constitute a thing "money" that it should be a legal tender receivable at a value in rupees fixed by law. Where a coin has a current value, attaching to it as coin, and not merely by weighing them as lumps of gold or silver, it is money.

CHAPTER VII.

OF GIFTS.

122. "Gift" is the transfer of certain existing moveable or immoveable property made voluntarily and without consideration, by one person, called the donor, to another, called the donee, and accepted by or on behalf of the donee.

"Gift" defined.

Such acceptance must be made during the lifetime of the donor and while he is still capable of giving.

Acceptance when to be made.

If the donee dies before acceptance, the gift is void.

1. Scope of the section.—This section deals with gifts inter vivos. A gift is a gratuitous transfer of property from one person to another.[1] It is an act whereby anything is voluntarily transferred from the true possessor to another person, with the full intention that the thing shall not return to the donor and with the full intention on the part of the receiver to retain the thing entirely as his own without restoring it to the giver.[2] The fact that the transaction of gift was brought about by undue influence does not necessarily mean that it was not made "voluntarily."[2a] But a gift like any other transfer may be made either absolutely or conditionally. Where it is made conditionally the property can be recovered back by the donor on breach of the condition.[3] The mere fact that a donee happens to be a Hindu female cannot lead to an inference that the gift is a gift for life and not an absolute gift. Each document has to be construed on its own terms.[3a] As to the validity of conditions against alienation, see S. 10. A gift which is complete and absolute at the time it was made cannot, however, be modified by conditions subsequently added.[4]

A release of a security in favour of the mortgagor is not a transfer of property and is not a gift within the meaning of this section.[5]

A gift of the income of a certain property without any limitation is equivalent to a gift of the property itself.[6]

In the undermentioned case,[7] a relinquishment by one of the two coparceners forming a joint Hindu family, of all his interests in the joint immovable property, was held to amount to a gift. It is doubtful whether this view is correct. (See S. 5, Note 4.)

2. "Without consideration."—This is an essential characteristic of a gift. The word "consideration" is not defined in this Act, but is defined in the Contract Act, 1872. Section 4 provides that the chapters and sections of this Act which relate to contracts shall be taken as part of the Contract Act. A gift cannot be said to relate to contracts inasmuch as there cannot be a contract without consideration. The definition of "consideration" in the Contract Act will not, therefore, necessarily apply to interpret the word "consideration" in this section by virtue of S. 4.[1] But it has been held that it has the same meaning under this section as it has under the Contract Act. Thus, it has been held that a transfer in consideration of natural love and affection (which is excluded from the definition of "consideration" under the Contract Act) is only a gift. So also is a transfer in consideration of an expectation of spiritual and moral benefit.[2] But the abandonment of a person's right to future maintenance is a "consideration" within the meaning of the Contract Act and a transfer for such consideration is not a gift.[3]

A transfer purported to be made for a consideration will not be a gift by reason merely of the fact that the consideration did not pass or that it is void. The transfer in such case is void. But a transfer which purports to be a sale may be shown to be only really a gift.[4]

The motive for a transfer is not the same thing as the consideration for it. A transfer for services rendered will, if the services are merely the motive for the transfer, be a gift.[5] A settlement on a wife will be a gift even if the marriage proves to be invalid.[6]

Where there is any consideration for a transfer it is not a gift.[7]

2a. Agreement to give.—An agreement to make a gift, being one without consideration is not enforceable as a contract. Consequently, the intended donee cannot compel the donor to make the gift, or, where the gift is incomplete, to complete the gift.[1] "If you want the assistance of the Court," said Lord Eldon in Ellison v. Ellison,[2] "to constitute you cestui que trust, and the instrument is voluntary, you shall not have that assistance for the purpose of constituting you cestui que trust; as upon a covenant to transfer stock, etc., if it rests in covenant, and is purely voluntary, this Court will not execute that voluntary covenant."

3. Competency to give.— Prima facie every one who is sui juris can dispose of by way of gift any property to which he is absolutely entitled.[1] An alien can dispose of his property in the same way as a British subject.[2] A corporation though a person in the eye of the law is the creature of and derives its power from the statute creating it and cannot make gifts except in conformity with the provisions of such statute.[3]

By virtue of S. 7, it is only a person competent to contract that can make any transfer of his property. Consequently, a minor,[4] or other person incompetent to contract, cannot make a valid gift.

Persons in fiduciary positions such as trustees cannot, unless they are authorised to do so, make gifts of the property vested in them on behalf of others.[5]

A pardanashin lady is not a person incompetent to contract, and is not competent to make a gift. But it is necessary to show very clearly that the lady fully understood the transaction when she made the gift.[6]

In the undermentioned case,[7] where a gift was alleged to have been made by an old and infirm woman, it was held that the burden of proving that it was executed with full knowledge of its contents and that she did so willingly without any pressure or undue influence is on the donee.

A leper is not incompetent to make a gift under the Hindu law.[8]

As to the powers of a father or manager or of a coparcener of a Hindu family or of a woman having a limited estate under the Hindu law to make a valid gift, see Note 7 on section 7.

See also Notes on section 7 generally.

4. Competency to receive.—In general all persons whether sui juris or not are competent to take a transfer of property[1] though a person who is not sui juris at the time of the gift may, after he becomes sui juris, avoid the gift.[2] A person who is legally disqualified from being a transferee cannot, however, take a transfer.[3]

The donee must be alive at the date of the gift. The representatives of a person dead at the date of the gift cannot take under it.[4] Under the Hindu law also the donee must be in existence at the time the gift takes effect.[5]

An agent of a person is not incapacitated from taking a gift from his principal[6] nor is there any prohibition in law against a gift being validly made to an idiot.[7]

Where a gift is made to a class, some of whom are not in existence at the date of the gift, it enures to the benefit of such of them as are capable of taking.[8]

5. "Person."—The donee must be an ascertained or ascertainable person.[1] The "public" cannot be a donee under this section, though apart from this section, there may be a dedication in favour of the public.[2] (See also Note 5a.) An unregistered society is a "person" and gift can be made in its favour.[3] (See section 5, Note 3.)

The word "person" will include "persons." A gift can, therefore, be made to two or more persons. Under the English law a gift in favour of two or more persons makes them joint tenants. In this country, the presumption is that they take only as tenants in common.[4] Where a gift is to two persons one of whom is capable of taking and the other is not, the former will take the whole of the property.[5]

5a. Gift to Hindu idol, etc.—It is settled that a gift or dedication can be validly made to a Hindu idol whether consecrated or to be consecrated.[1] But there is a conflict of opinion as to whether such a gift or dedication is a gift within the meaning of this Act, and several views have been expressed. The first view is that though a Hindu idol is a juristic person capable of holding and acquiring property,[1a] it is not a "living" person within the meaning of S. 5 and, consequently, the gift is not a "transfer of property" at all and is therefore not within this section.[2] The second view is that the notion of acceptance by a deity of worldly goods is contrary to Hindu religion and that, therefore, a gift to an idol is not a gift within the meaning of this section as it lacks the element of acceptance, which is an essential requisite for a valid gift.[3] A third view is that a gift or dedication to an idol operates only as renunciation by the donor of the property and not as a transfer by the donor. Consequently, it is not a gift within the meaning of this section.[4] A fourth view is that a gift to an idol is a gift under this section, the acceptance being made by the shebait of the idol.[5]

A dedication by a Hindu for a religious or charitable object is not a gift as defined in this section. Such a dedication is permitted under the Hindu law and its validity is not affected by the provisions of this Act. Hence, a dedication of a house for a choultry does not require registration under S. 123.[5a] (See also Mulla, Principles of Hindu Law, 9th Edn., 1940, pp. 474-475 and Mayne, Hindu Law and Usage, 10th Edn., 1938, pp. 922-923.)

6. "Existing moveable or immoveable property."—This chapter, unlike chapters III, IV and V, is not limited to immovable property. It deals with gifts of both movable and immovable property.

A gift can be made only of existing property, and the same must be transferable under S. 6. Thus, there cannot be a gift of property that may come into existence in the future, or of the things referred to in section 6.

An actionable claim is an existing property and can be validly gifted.

It has been held in the undermentioned case[1] that, by usage, a Goswami of the Ballavacharya sect has an interest in the property held by him (including the temple and the idol) of which he can make a gift.

A gift of a non-transferable occupancy holding cannot be questioned by the heirs of the donor himself on the ground of its non-transferability, though such transfer may not be binding on the landlord.[2]

A gift of a mortgage is a gift of immovable property within the meaning of this section.[3]

7. "Accepted by or on behalf of the donee."—The acceptance of a gift is an essential element of a gift whether under the English law or under this Act. But, under the English law, the acceptance by the donee is presumed until his dissent is signified,[1] and this is so even if the donee is not aware of the gift or even if the gift is onerous.[2] The presumption is made on the principle that a man may be fairly presumed to assent to that to which he, in all probability, would assent if the opportunity, of so doing were given to him. The presumption may be rebutted, and a donee on becoming aware of the gift is entitled to repudiate it.[3] The English rule was applied to a case arising in this country before the Act.[4]

Under this section, however, the law is different.[5] There must be actual acceptance in fact, though it need not be express.[6] From the conduct of the donee Courts may, of course, draw a presumption that he accepted the gift.[6a] But this is a presumption of fact and not of law as in England. Where, for instance, it is shown that the donee was not aware of the gift, it cannot be presumed that he accepted the gift, and there is no valid gift.[7] The mere custody of the gift-deed by the donor cannot lead to an inference that the donee did not accept the gift, especially where the entire conduct of the donee shows that he accepted the gift and the gift-deed was kept in a place where the donee had also access.[7a] On the other hand the mere possession of the gift-deed by the donee will not be conclusive proof that the gift deed was accepted by him. Thus it is possible that he may have taken possession of the document without the knowledge and intention of the donor.[7b]

The acceptance may be made by or on behalf of the donee. An agent may accept the gift on behalf of his principal. A guardian of a minor or other person incompetent to contract may accept a gift in favour of such person on his behalf.[8] It has even been held in the undermentioned case[9] that the minor himself is competent to personally accept a gift without a guardian.

The acceptance of a gift which is onerous is sufficient to constitute a valid gift. It is not necessary that the onerous conditions also should be specifically accepted.[10] But this would not disable the donee from setting up the invalidity of the burden. Thus, where mortgaged property was gifted by A to his sons, the sons were held entitled to question the validity of the mortgage.[11]

8. Donor dying before acceptance.—A gift must be accepted during the lifetime of the donor and while he is still capable of giving. The principle is that it is essential that there should be a transfer of the ownership during the lifetime of the donor;[1] and this will happen in a gift, only when it is accepted by the donee. If he dies or ceases to be capable of giving, before acceptance, the gift becomes void. But where it is accepted during the lifetime of the donor, the deed of gift, where there is one, might be got registered after his death.[2]

Where the donor has handed over the document of gift to the donee who has received it, it is sufficient acceptance. The fact that it was not stamped properly and the stamp duty and penalty were paid after the death of the donor does not detract from the completeness of the gift during his lifetime.[3]

9. Accepted gift is complete though deed is registered later.—See Note 6 on S. 123.

10. Donee dying before acceptance.—Since a donee must, in order to constitute a valid gift, actually accept the gift, the gift will be void where he dies before such acceptance.

11. Advancement.—In English law where a husband or father pays money and purchases property in the name of the wife or child, the presumption is that the purchase was intended to be an advancement to the wife or the child.[1] This doctrine has no application to this country.[2] The husband or the father would nevertheless be the beneficial owner of the property purchased.[3] Where A deposited his money in the name of himself and his wife, it was held that there was no presumption of any intended advancement to the wife.[4] As between two persons born of British parents, the English law would, however, apply.[5] But the doctrine does not apply in the case of Indian Christians.[6]

12. Gift to a persona designata.—Where a gift is made to A describing him "as the adopted son of the donor" and it turns out that the adoption is not valid, or that no adoption of A ever took place, the question, whether the gift to A stands, depends upon the further question whether the words "my adopted son" are merely words of description or whether the fact of adoption was the motive and reason for the gift. In the former case, the gift would be valid though the adoption is not valid or did not take place. In the latter case the gift will be invalid.[1] "The

14. What passes under a gift.—See Notes on s. 8, and also the undermentioned case.[1]

15. Gift or trust.—An incomplete gift or voluntary transfer of property cannot take effect as a declaration of trust, since the donor's intention to transfer the property negatives any suggestion that he might have contemplated retaining the property as a trustee upon failure of the gift or voluntary transfer.[1]

16. Gift or sale.—A document purporting to be a gift may be shown to be really a sale. So also a document purporting to be a sale may be shown to be in reality a gift.[1] The test is whether there is any consideration for the transaction. If there is consideration the transaction cannot be considered to be a gift, but will operate as a sale. The question must be decided upon a construction of the document in each case.[2]

But under S. 92, Evidence Act, evidence of an oral agreement or statement will not be admissible, as between the parties, to alter the effect of a document.[3] But a third party can adduce such evidence.[4]

17. Gift or will.—A document purporting to be a will may really be a gift[1] or a document purporting to be a gift may really be a will.[2] The test is when is the document to take effect and whether the power to revoke is reserved by the author expressly or by necessary implication.[3]

3. Buddhist law.—Under the Buddhist law delivery of possession to the donee was necessary for the completion of a gift.[1] But the law regards delivery of possession has been abrogated by S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act[2] which applied to Buddhists even before the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XX of 1929, by virtue of the old S. 129 of the Act which apart from the provisions of S. 123 saved all rules of Buddhist law relating to gifts.

It has been held that the Burmese Buddhists religious gifts are not excepted from the operation of this section and must therefore be effected in accordance with its provisions.[3] gift complies with the provisions of that law it will not become invalid by the mere presence of a deed of gift which, owing to some defect, is invalid under S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act.[4] As held by Suhrawardy, J., in Nasib Ali v. Wejed Ali.[5]

> "A gift in order to be valid must be made in accordance with the forms stated above, and even if it is evidenced by writing, unless all the essential forms are observed it is not valid according to law. That being so, a deed of gift executed by a Muhammadan is not the instrument effecting, creating or making the gift but a mere piece of evidence. It may so happen after a lapse of time that the evidence of the observance of the above forms might not be forthcoming; so it is sometimes thought prudent to reduce the fact that a gift has been made into writing. Such writing is not a document of title but is a piece of evidence."

It has been held that even where a Muhammadan makes a gift to a Hindu, the gift is governed by the rules of Muhammadan law and not by the provisions of this section.[6]

See also Notes on section 129.

5. Gift of immovable property.—As seen in Note 1, the section requires that a gift of immovable property, irrespective of its value, must be effected only by a registered instrument signed by or on behalf of the donor and attested by at least two witnesses. The effect of such instrument is that title legally passes from the donor to the donee and any mental reservation or secret intention on the part of the donor to the contrary is ineffective and cannot prevent the legal effect of a validly executed gift deed.[1a] A gift which does not comply with this requirement is bad and cannot pass any title to the donee.[1] acceptance by the donee. Consequently, the donour can revoke the gift before such acceptance.[1]

Before the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kalyanasundaram v. Karuppa[2] there was a difference of opinion as to whether a gift which had been accepted by the donee was suspended in its operation until the registration of the deed of gift. According to one view[3] a deed of gift was not complete until it was registered and could therefore be revoked before registration, even if it had been accepted by the donee. Another view was that a donor could not be compelled to register the deed of gift since that would be compelling him to complete an incomplete gift and that therefore the registration of a deed of gift against the wishes of a donor was void.[4] In the undermentioned case[5] it was held that a voluntary registration of a deed of gift by the legal representatives of a donor had the same effect as its voluntary registration by the donor in his lifetime.

The undermentioned cases[6] held that the expression "registered instrument" in this section meant registered in accordance with the provisions of the Registration Act; that there was nothing in the section which required the donor to register the deed of gift himself and that the deed of gift was therefore not invalid merely because the registration of it took place against the wishes of the donor or after his death. A Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in Venkati Rama Reddi v. Pillai Rama Reddi[7] accepted the last view and a later Full Bench decision[8] of the same High Court followed it. Subsequently, the Bombay High Court also in a full bench decision in Atmaram Sakharam v. Vaman Janardhan[9] held that once a deed of gift of immovable property was executed by the donor, handed over of the donee and accepted by him, the gift became complete and the donor could not revoke it after such acceptance even if it had not been registered at that time.

The conflict of views has now been set at rest by the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kalyanasundaram v. Karuppa[10] and Venkatasubba Srinivas Hegde v. Subba Rama Hegde[11] affirming the law as laid down by the said Full Bench decisions. Their Lordships in the first of these cases observed as follows:

> "It has been forcibly argued that, until registration there is no complete gift, and that if the donor dies or revokes or becomes incapable of making the gift before the registration, it cannot take effect. On the other hand attention must be directed to S. 47 of the Indian Registration Act of 1877, which is in these terms:
> 'A registered document shall operate from the time which it would have commenced to operate if no registration thereof had been required or made, and not from the time of its registration.'
>
> They are unable to see how the provision of S. 123 of the Transfer of Property Act can be reconciled with S. 47 of the Registration Act, except upon the view that; while registration is a necessary solemnity in order to the enforcement of a gift of immovable property, it does not suspend the gift until registration actually takes place. When the instrument of gift has been handed by the donor to the donee and accepted by him, the former has done everything in his power to complete the donation and to make it effective. Registration does not depend upon his consent, but is the act of an officer appointed by law for the purpose, who, if the deed is executed by or on behalf of the donor and is attested by at least two witnesses, must register it if it is presented by a person having the necessary interest within the prescribed period. Neither death, nor the express revocation by the donor, is a ground for refusing registration, if the other conditions are complied with."[12]

Where a deed of gift has been accepted by the donee its registration after his death cannot invalidate it.[13]

7. "Signed by or on behalf of the donor."—A difficulty has arisen in the interpretation of this expression in view of the fact that the Act has used different expressions in different sections dealing with the mode of transfer. Thus in S. 130 the words used are "signed by the transferor or his duly authorised agent." In S. 59 the expression used is "signed by the mortgagor." And in Ss. 54 and 107, there is no reference to the signature of the transferor. The words "on his behalf" taken literally would seem to include any one signing on behalf of the donor, whether with or without authority. It has, however, been observed by the Allahabad High Court[1] that the words have been loosely used in the section, and must be construed as meaning only a signature by a person duly authorised by the donor.

In the undermentioned case[2] A made a gift of a house to B, but did not execute any document of gift. But B passed a document to A reciting that a gift of the house was made to him by A. The document was signed by B. It was held that it could not have the effect of a valid gift under this section.

As to the meaning of the word "signed," see Note 12 on section 3.

8. "Attested by at least two witnesses."—The section requires that the deed of gift must be "attested by at least two witnesses." If there is not attestation as required by the section the deed of gift is null and void,[1] and cannot affect the property which is the subject of the gift.[2] The word "attested" has been defined in S. 3. (See Notes 11 to 19 on that section.) The definition was inserted for the first time in that section by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XXVII of 1926. According to that definition, the word "attested" itself means "attested by two or more witnesses." So the words "by at least two witnesses" occurring after the word "attested" in this seetion have now become superfluous.

9. Doctrine of part performance, whether applies to gifts.—As to the question whether the plea of part performance is available as a defence to a person who is in possession of immovable property under an unregistered deed of gift, see Note 7 on S. 53A and the undermentioned cases.[1]

10. Donee's possession under invalid gift of immovable property.—A gift of immovable property is invalid if it is not effected in the manner laid down in the first clause of this section. The possession of the donee under such an invalid gift is adverse to the donor and if he remains in possession for a period of twelve years his title becomes perfect by prescription.[1]

11. Section applies to gifts in Cantonment areas.—The section has been extended to every Cantonment in British India by S. 287 of the Cantonments Act, II of 1924 (old S. 32 of the Cantonments Act, XIII of 1889), sub-s. (1) of which enacts as follows:

> "Paragraphs 2 and 3 of S. 54 and Ss. 59, 107 and 123 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, with respect to the transfer of property by registered instrument, shall, on and from the commencement of this Act, extend to every Cantonment."

In the undermentioned Lahore case[1] an oral gift was made by a Mahomedan to another in the Cantonment area. It was contended that S. 123 should be read along with S. 129 and that the gift was valid under the Mahomedan law. It was held that, inasmuch as only S. 123 had been extended to the Cantonment area and not S. 129, the Mahomedan law could not be applied to the case and the oral gift was therefore not valid. Abdul Raoof, J., observed:

> "The only question then to determine is whether an oral gift, by a Mahomedan of property situate in the cantonment can be made under S. 32, Cantonments Act. The provisions of S. 123, Transfer of Property Act, IV of 1882, have been made applicable to all gifts whether made by a Hindu, Mahomedan or a Buddhist. It is, however, contended that S. 123 cannot be read without S. 129, Transfer of Property Act. The omission of the inclusion of S. 129, Transfer of Property Act, in S. 32, Cantonments Act, may be intentional or accidental.
> "It is not, however, necessary for me to determine what the exact reasons for this omission may be, for I must take the law as it stands and, interpreting it according to the well-recognised rules of statutes relating to construction, I cannot but hold that the effect of S. 32, Cantonments Act, is that a gift must be made in the manner provided by S. 123, Transfer of Property Act."

It is submitted that this view does not appear to be good law in view of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Ma Mi v. Kallandar Ammal[2] which was a case in which the Local Government had extended S. 123 to a particular area, but not S. 129. Their Lordships held that the Local Government had no power to extend a particular section of the Act so as to give it an effect not contemplated by the Act.

12. Delivery of property.—As seen in Note 1 the section provides two alternative modes of transfer in the case of the gifts of moveable property :(a) a registered instrument signed by or on behalf of the donor and attested by at least two witnesses; and (b) delivery of the property. With regard to delivery of the property the section says that it may be made in the same way as goods sold may be delivered. Thus, delivery of movable property under this section is the delivery described in S. 33 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930 (old S. 90 of the Contract Act, 1872),[1] which provides for delivery of goods sold. It runs as follows :

> "Delivery of goods sold may be made by doing anything which the parties agree shall be treated as delivery or which has the effect of putting the goods in the possession of the buyer or of any person authorised to hold them on his behalf."

Where a certain sum was bestowed as gratuity on one X, a servant in the employment of a Railway Company, and the same was sanctioned to be paid to X and the order for payment was received by the pay-master, but before payment was made to X the amount was attached in execution of a decree obtained against him by K, it was held that the receipt of the order to pay was not equivalent to a delivery of the money to X as he was not put in possession of the money, that the money was not therefore at the disposal of X, and could not be attached by K before it was received by X.[2] In the undermentioned case[2a] a certain sum of money was sanctioned as gratuity in favour of the deceased employee of a Railway Company and the amount was credited to the Provident Fund account of the deceased. It was held that there was no delivery of possession within the meaning of this section as the amount was not credited to the account of any living person who was entitled to receive the gratuity. Where the property gifted is handed over to the Court of Wards on account of a minor donee and the Court of Wards assumed superintendence of the property, there is a sufficient delivery so as to pass the property to the donee.[2b]

Where the property gifted is in the possession of a third person and the third person consents to hold the property on behalf of the donee when asked by the donor to deliver the property to the donee, there is no sufficient delivery of the property to the donee if the third person is not authorised by the donee to hold the property on his behalf. In such a case the transaction does not operate to transfer the property to the donee.[3]

Where the property gifted is already in the possession of the donee, a fresh delivery at the time of the gift is not necessary. It is sufficient if the conduct of the parties shows that the ownership in the property has changed.[4] Thus, where a person is in possession of a barge as servant of his master at the time of the gift of the barge, but after the gift, works the barge as an owner, there is sufficient delivery of possession and the property becomes vested in him.[5]

Where the goods are stored and locked up in a warehouse the delivery of the key to the donee giving exclusive control over the goods is sufficient delivery of the goods.[6]

In the undermentioned case[7] a deposit was made in a bank by the husband in the joint names of himself and his wife in the following terms : "Mr. and Mrs. Hope, payable to either or survivor." It was held that there was no gift of the money by the husband to the wife as there was no delivery of the money by the husband to the wife within the meaning of S. 123 and that the English law which presumed a gift by the husband to the wife, in such a case, defeasible on the death of the wife in the life-time of the husband, was not applicable in India.

A fixed deposit in a bank is not a deposit of specie but a debt or an actionable claim and a gift of such a deposit is not a gift of movable property but a gift of an actionable claim. The handing over of a fixed deposit receipt, therefore, is not enough to pass title to the deposit. The gift must comply with the requirements of S. 130[7a].

13. Incomplete gift does not constitute donor trustee for donee.—See Note 15 on Section 122.

14. Gifts of actionable claims.—A gift of an actionable claim is governed by S. 130 and not by this section. See Notes on that section.

A deed of gift of immovable property and actionable claims which fails as a gift of immovable property for non-compliance with the requirements of this section does not fail also as a gift of actionable claims unless the gift of the latter is made conditional on the gift of the former taking place.[1]

As to whether a gift of a fixed deposit in a bank is a gift of movable property or actionable, see Note 12.

15. Law in places to which Transfer of Property Act is not extended. — This section will not affect gifts effected in places to which the Transfer of Property Act is not extended.[1] But if there is a deed of gift of immovable property it is compulsorily registrable under S. 17 of the Registration Act, and if not so registered will not under S. 49 of that Act, affect the property comprised therein or be received in evidence of any transaction affecting such property. It will, however, be admissible in evidence for the purposes mentioned in the proviso to that section. See also the undermentioned cases.[2]

16. Extent.—As to limitations to the territorial operation of the section, see the last paragraph of section 1.

Gift of existing and future property.

2. Gift of future property, if operrates as contract to give future property.

1. Scope of the section.—By its very definition a gift is a transfer of existing property. And indeed, as has been seen in Note 7 on S. 5 there can be no transfer of any kind of what is not in existence. It follows that a gift of property that may come into existence in the future is void.[1]

[Owners of property cannot transfer by way of gift the future income of property before it has accrued.]

Where a gift purports to be of existing property as well as future property, this section provides that the whole gift is not void but only so much of the gift as relates to the future property.

2. Gift of future property, if operates as contract to give future property.—It has been seen in Note 7 on S. 5 that if a person purports to make a transfer of what may come into existence in future, it will be regarded only as a contract to assign the property when it comes into existence in future. This rule, however, applies only to attempted transfer for consideration, of future property, for a contract must be supported by consideration; otherwise it will be void. A gift is a transfer without consideration, and there can be no contract, therefore, to make a gift. A transfer by way of gift, of future property is thus void not only as a transfer, but also as a contract to transfer the property.

3. Muhammadan law.—This section does not affect any rule of Muhammadan law (see S. 129). But there is no inconsistency between this section and any rule of Muhammadan law. Even under that law, there cannot be a gift of future property.[1]

125. A gift of a thing to two or more donees, of whom one does not accept it, is void as to the interest which he would have taken had he accepted.

Gift to several, of whom one does not accept.

1. Scope of the section.—The general principle that where a transfer of property is made in favour of A and B and the transfer fails with regard to B, the whole transfer does not fail, but only fails in regard to B, has been recognised by the Indian Legislature in various provisions. Thus, S. 115 of the Succession Act provides that where a bequest is made to a class of persons with regard to some of whom the interest fails by reason of the rule against perpetuities, such interest fails in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class. A similar provision is found in Ss. 15 and 22 of this Act.

This section also is in accordance with the said general principle and provides that the failure of a gift as regards one of two or more donees by reason of non-acceptance operates as a failure only to the extent of the interest which he would have taken had he accepted.

The section does not appear to be limited in its operation to cases where a gift is made to two or more persons as joint tenants. It would seem to apply to all transfers whether made jointly or severally to two or more persons. But the effect of the failure of the gift as regards one of them by reason of non-acceptance, on the interest of the other donees, would differ according as the gift was made to them as joint tenants or tenants in common. In the former case, the donees who accept the gift would take the whole[1] while in the latter case, their shares will not be increased, by the share of the other who does not accept the gift.

As to whether and when two or more donees take as joint tenants or as tenants-in-common, see Note 6 on section 45.

126. The donor and donee may agree that on the happening of any specified event which does not depend on the will of the donor a gift shall be suspended or revoked; but a gift which the parties agree shall be revocable wholly or in part, at the mere will of the donor, is void wholly or in part, as the case may be.

When gift may be suspended or revoked.

A gift may also be revoked in any of the cases (save want or failure of consideration) in which, if it were a contract, it might be rescinded.

Save as aforesaid, a gift cannot be revoked.

Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed to affect the rights of transferees for consideration without notice.

1. Scope of the section.—This section deals with the circumstances under which a gift may be suspended or revoked. The first paragraph provides that a gift may be suspended or revoked by agreement of parties. The second paragraph provides that a gift may be revoked on grounds on which contracts might be rescinded. The words "save as aforesaid, a gift cannot be revoked" show that the section is exhaustive of the way in which a gift can be revoked. The contrary observation in the undermentioned case[1] is, it is submitted, not correct.

Before the amendment of S. 129 in 1929, this section did not affect any rule of Hindu law. Under that law, if a person made a gift to another in expectation that the donee will do some work in consideration of the gift, and the donee failed to do it, the gift was revocable.[2] This will not be good law after the amendment of S. 129, rendering this section applicable to Hindu gifts also.

This section does not affect any rule of Muhammadan law. As to the revocability of gifts under that law, see Mulla's Principles of Muhammadan Law.

2. Agreement for revocation.—The first paragraph of the section refers to agreements for the suspension or revocation of gifts. As has been seen in Note 14 on S. 10, this section does not deal with conditions imposed by the donor in the gift and it is incorrect to speak of agreements for revocation under this section as "conditions," as has been done in some cases.[1] But apart from this section, however, a person can make conditional gifts. The conditions in such cases must be valid conditions under the various provisions of Chapter II.[2]

An agreement for revocation under this section must, of course, be a valid agreement. Further the event on which the parties agree to revoke the gift must not depend upon the will of the donor. In other words, an agreement for revocation of a gift must satisfy two conditions :

(1) it must be valid as an agreement under the law of contracts, and

(2) the event, on the happening of which the gift is to be suspended or revoked, must not depend upon the will of the donor.

Where A made a gift of funds for the specific purpose of founding a college for a particular community, and the founding of such college became impossible by the passing of the University Act, it was held that the promoters of the scheme and the donors must be deemed to have agreed within the meaning of this section that on the failure of the scheme, the gift shall be revoked.[3]

2a. Conditional assignment of insurance policy.—Where a policy of life insurance is assigned with the provision that if the assignee should pre-decease the assignor, the benefit under the policy should revert to the assignor and form part of his estate, the latter provision is valid under this section. The contingency on which the assignment is to be revoked not depending on the assignor's will, is covered by the first part of the first paragraph of this section.[1]

3. Gift revocable at the will of the donor.—Where the gift is revocable wholly or in part at the mere will of the donor the gift is void wholly or in part as the case may be.[1] The reason is that where a party declares his intention to make a gift and then annexes to such a declaration a stipulation that he will revoke it when he wills it, the declaration of the gift is contradictory in itself and there is no gift at all.[2]

4. Resumability of service tenures.—See Note 69 on Section 105.

5. Paragraph 2—General.—As has been seen in Note 3 on S. 4, sales, mortgages, leases and exchanges are all transfers of property based initially on contracts and the chapters of the Act dealing with those transfers must be taken as part of the Contract Act.

The chapter on gifts cannot, however, be said to relate to contracts inasmuch as a gift is a transfer without consideration. Consequently, this chapter cannot, by virtue of S. 4, be read as part of the Contract Act. The special provision in the second paragraph has, therefore, been inserted in this section making a gift revocable in cases in which, if it were a contract it might be rescinded. A contract may be rescinded where it is voidable under the provisions of the Contract Act, these provisions being Ss. 19, 19A, 39, 53 and 55. By virtue of this paragraph, a gift also can be revoked on the grounds referred to in the said sections. Thus, a gift can be revoked on the ground of coercion, fraud, misrepresentation or undue influence.[1]

6. Coercion.—A contract brought about by coercion is voidable under S. 19 of the Contract Act. Consequently, a gift brought about by coercion would under this section be revoked.

"Coercion" is defined in S. 15 of the Contract Act as follows :

" 'Coercion' is the committing, or threatening to commit, any act forbidden by the Indian Penal Code, or the unlawful detaining, or threatening to detain, any property, to the prejudice of any person whatever, with the intention of causing any person to enter into an agreement.

Explanation. — It is immaterial whether the Indian Penal Code is or is not in force in the place where the coercion is employed."

In Chikkam Ammiraju v. Seshamma,[1] where a husband attempted to commit suicide in consequence of which he obtained a deed of release from his wife and the son, it was held that his act amounted to "threatening to commit an act forbidden by the Penal Code" and therefore to "coercion" and that the deed was, therefore, liable to be set aside.

7. Fraud.—Since a contract procured by fraud is voidable under S. 19 of the Contract Act, a gift obtained by fraud would, under this section, be revocable at the option of the donor.[1] As to the meaning of "fraud," see S. 6, Note 32.

8. Misrepresentation.—A gift may be revoked if it had been caused by a misrepresentation of fact.[1] As to the meaning of "misrepresentation" see S. 78, Note 3.

9. Undue influence.—A contract is, under S. 19A of the Contract Act, voidable on the ground of undue influence. A gift brought about by undue influence will, accordingly, under this section, be revocable by the donor.

"Undue influence" is the most common ground on which a gift is generally sought to be revoked. It has been defined in S. 16, Contract Act, 1872, as follows :

> "Section 16. (1) A contract is said to be induced by 'undue influence' where the relations subsisting between the parties are such that one of the parties is in a position to dominate the will of the other and uses that position to obtain an unfair advantage over the other.
>
> (2) In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing principle a person is deemed to be in a position to dominate the will of another —
>
> (a) where he holds a real or apparent authority over the other, or where he stands in a fiduciary relation to the other, or
> (b) where he makes a contract with a person whose mental capacity is temporarily or permanently affected by reason of age, illness, or mental or bodily distress.
>
> (3) Where a person who is in a position to dominate the will of another, enters into a contract with him, and the transaction appears, on the face of it or on the evidence adduced, to be unconscionable, the burden of proving that such contract was not induced by undue influence shall lie upon the person in a position to dominate the will of the other.
>
> Nothing in this sub-section shall affect the provisions of S. 111 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.
>
> Illustrations.
>
> (a) A, having advanced money to his son, B, during his minority, upon B's coming of age obtains, by misuse of parental influence, a bond from B for a greater amount than the sum due in respect of the advance. A employs undue influence.
>
> (b) A, a man enfeebled by disease or age, is induced, by B's influence over him as his medical attendant, to agree to pay B, an unreasonable sum for his professional services. B employs undue influence.
>
> (c) A, being in debt to B, the money-lender of his village, contracts a fresh loan on terms which appear to be unconscionable. It lies on B to prove that the contract was not induced by undue influence.
>
> (d) A applies to a banker for a loan at a time when there is stringency in the money market. The banker declines to make the loan except at an unusually high rate of interest. A accepts the loan on these terms. This is a transaction in the ordinary course of business, and the contract is not induced by undue influence."

In Sital Prasad v. Prabhu Lal,[1] Straight, J., observed as follows :

> "It is of the most serious public importance that the free and voluntary contracts of persons in favour of others should, in no way, be interfered with or disturbed by the Courts of law, and it is not > because a man chooses to make an ill-considered or foolish contract, that therefore the Courts of law are to step in and relieve him of the consequences of his act.....But what the Courts in this country will do, is to see that, where one person is so situated as to be under the control and influence of another, such other does not unduly or unfairly exercise that influence and control over such person for his own advantage or benefit."

In Allcard v. Skinner,[2] Lindley, L. J., explains the principle as follows :

> "What then is the principle? Is it that it is right and expedient to save persons from the consequences of their own folly? or is it that it is right and expedient to save them from being victimised by other people? In my opinion, the doctrine of undue influence is founded on the second of these two principles. Courts of equity have never set aside gifts on the ground of the folly, imprudence, or want of foresight on the part of the donors. The Courts have always repudiated any such jurisdiction.....On the other hand, to protect people from being forced, tricked or misled in any way by others into parting with their property is one of the most legitimate objects of all laws."

The relation of dependence arises (a) from a special authority or confidence reposed in the donee, or (b) from the feebleness in mind or body of the donor. There are many classes of influence in which the donee from his position is presumed to be likely to have exercised special influence over the mind of the donor, though the Courts have refused to enumerate exhaustively the cases in which the presumption of undue influence will prima facie be made.[2a] Some examples of such influence are, the influence of a solicitor over his client,[3] of a medical attendant over his patient,[4] of a spiritual adviser over his disciple,[5] of a trustee over his cestui que trust,[6] of an executor over the beneficiary under the will,[7] of a guardian over his ward,[8] of a parent over his child,[9] of an agent over his principal,[10] and of a paramour over his mistress.[10a] In all such cases, and other cases of dependence the relationship itself does not necessarily preclude the making of the gift; but the burden is on the donee to show that there was no such influence. He can discharge the burden by showing that the gift was the spontaneous act of the donor, acting under circumstances which enabled the donor to exercise an independent will and which justifies the Court in holding that the gift was the result of the free exercise of the donor's will.[11]

There is no rule of law that the gift is invalid in the absence of competent independent advice.[12] The possession of competent independent advice or the absence of it, no doubt, a fact relevant to the issue, whether the donor thoroughly comprehended and deliberately, and of his own free will, carried out the transaction. But if upon review of the facts, the conclusion is reached that the obtaining of independent advice would not have made any difference in the result, then the deed ought to stand even when no independent advice was obtained.[13] Similarly, the absence of the power of revocation in the gift deed is merely a circumstance to be weighed with the other circumstances of the case.[14] Nor will the Courts consider the propriety or impropriety of the clauses except as evidence that the settlor did not understand what he was doing.[14a]

In Muhammad Baksh v. Hoseini Bibi,[15] Lord Macnaghten pointed out the following questions as being those which a Court should consider in deciding the issue of undue influence :

(a) whether the gift in question is one which a right minded person might be expected to make ;

(b) whether the gift is or is not an improvident act on the donor's part ;

(c) whether the gift is such as to have required advice if not obtained by the donor ; and

(d) whether the intention to make the gift originated with the donor.

10. Pardanashin women.—Pardanashin women have always been treated as a class of persons specially exposed to undue influence. In the case of deeds taken from them, the burden of proof rests, as in the case of all improvident transactions by persons who are dependent upon or subject to the influence of others, on those who found their claim on them[1] and the Courts have been careful to see that the strongest and

Baksh Singh v. Ram Gopal Singh[2a] the Privy Council observed :

"The law throws around her special cloak of protection. It demands that the burden of proof shall in such a case rest, not with those who attack, but with those who found upon the deed, and the proof must go so far as to show affirmatively and conclusively that the deed was not only executed by but was explained to, and was really understood by, the grantor."

If, however, pardanashin lady understands the transaction and acts as a free agent, the absence of competent independent advice will not invalidate the gift.[3] While it is important to maintain the principles of law laid down for the protection of pardanashin ladies, it is also important not to transmute such a legal protection into a legal disability.[4]

11. Mistake.—Under S. 20 of the Contract Act an agreement, both the parties to which are under a mistake of fact, is void and not merely voidable.[1] Again under S. 22 of that Act it is provided that the fact that one of the parties to a contract is under a mistake of fact does not render the contract voidable.

Thus, on the wording of the sections of the Contract Act no question of the rescission of the contract arises in such cases. It would seem to follow that a gift cannot be revoked merely on the ground that the donor was under a mistake of fact.[2] Section 36 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, would, however, seem to suggest that a contract may be rescinded for mere mistake. That section runs as follows :

> "Rescission of a contract in writing cannot be adjudged for mere mistake, unless the party against whom it is adjudged can be restored to substantially the same position as if the contract had not been made."

As pointed out by Pollock and Mulla in their work on "The Indian Contract and Specific Relief Acts," it is difficult to reconcile the language of that section (S. 36, Specific Relief Act, 1877) with Ss. 20 and 22 of the Contract Act, 1872.[3]

As to gifts to persona designata, see Note 12 on section 122.

12. Limitation for suit to revoke gifts.—See Notes on Art. 91 of the A.I.R. Commentaries on the Limitation Act, 2nd (1942) Edn.

13. Right to revoke gift—When may be lost.—A right to revoke a gift under the second paragraph of the section may be lost by the donor's conduct amounting to an election by him not to revoke the gift,[1] though mere laches or delay in suing for relief will not destroy the right so long as it is not barred by limitation.[2]

14. Who may suspend or revoke gifts.—A right to revoke a gift under the provisions of this section may, of course, be exercised by the donor himself. It also survives after his death to his legal representatives who may therefore revoke the gift.[1] But being a mere right to sue, it cannot be transferred by the donor and, consequently, a transferee from the donor cannot claim to exercise such right.[2]

15. Revocation, if need be express.—The revocation of gift must, as in the case of rescission of contracts,[1] be by an express and unequivocal act. In the undermentioned case[2] where it was argued that the power of revocation was an incident of a gift by a Burmese Buddhist parent to his children, it was observed by the Lower Burma Chief Court that, assuming that such a power existed, it must be done by an express act, and could not be inferred merely from the fact that the donor conveyed the gifted property subsequently to another person.

16. "Save as aforesaid a gift cannot be revoked."—Paragraph 3.—It has been seen in Note 6 on S. 123 that an incomplete gift which has not been accepted by the donee, may be revoked by the donor before its acceptance.[1] But where a gift is complete and the donor has done all in his power to give effect to it, it is irrevocable except in the circumstances mentioned in this section.[1a] The provision in this section to that effect is merely a legislative recognition of the doctrine enunciated more than two centuries ago by Lord Nottingham in the case of Villers v. Beaumont[2]:

> "If a man will improvidently bind himself up by a voluntary deed, and not reserve a liberty to himself by a power of revocation, this Court will not loose the fetters he hath put upon himself, but he must lie down under his own folly; for, if you would relieve in such a case, you must consequently establish this proposition, namely, that a man can make no voluntary disposition of his estate, but by his will only, which would be absurd."

17. "Transferees for consideration without notice"—Paragraph 4.—A right of revocation under this section cannot be exercised against a transferee for consideration without notice of the existence of such right.[1] A volunteer or a person who takes with notice of the existence of the right, cannot get the benefit of the saving clause.[2] As was observed by Mukherji, J., in Forman Ali v. Uzir Ali Shek[3]:

> "It is a well-established proposition of law that in case of a gift tainted by undue influence and imposition of the person procuring the gift, even an innocent third party cannot retain the gift, if he is a mere volunteer. But if he is a purchaser for value without notice, there is no obligation of restitution on his part."

As to what amounts to notice, see Notes on section 3.

Where a gift is in the form of two or more separate and independent transfers to the same person of several things, the donee is at liberty to accept one of them and refuse the others, although the former may be beneficial and the latter onerous.

Onerous gift to disqualified person.

A donee not competent to contract and accepting property burdened by any obligation is not bound by his acceptance. But if, after becoming competent to contract and being aware of the obligation, he retains the property given, he becomes so bound.

Illustrations.

(a) A has shares in X, a prosperous joint stock company, and also shares in Y, a joint stock company, in difficulties. Heavy calls are expected in respect of the shares in Y. A gives B all his shares in joint stock companies. B refuses to accept the shares in Y. He cannot take the shares in X.

(b) A having a lease for a term of years of a house at a rent which he and his representatives are bound to pay during the term, and which is more than the house can be let for, gives to B the lease, and also, as a separate and independent transaction, a sum of money. B refuses to accept the lease. He does not by this refusal forfeit the money.

Synopsis

1. Analogous law.
2. Scope of the section.
3. Gifts subject to conditions.
4. Onerous gift to disqualified person.
5. Effect of acceptance of onerous gift.

1. Analogous law.—The first two paragraphs of this section correspond to Ss. 122 and 123 of the Succession Act, 1925, which run as follows:

"122. Where a bequest imposes an obligation on the legatee, he can take nothing by it unless he accepts it fully.

Illustration.

A, having shares in (x), a prosperous joint stock company and also shares in (y), a joint stock company in difficulties, in respect of which shares heavy calls are expected to be made, bequeaths to B all his shares in joint stock companies; B refuses to accept the shares in (y). He forfeits the shares in (x).

"123. Where a will contains two separate and independent bequests to the same person, the legatee is at liberty to accept one of them and refuse the other, although the former may be beneficial and the latter onerous.

Illustration.

A, having a lease for a term of years of a house at a rent which he and his representatives are bound to pay during the term, and which is higher than the house can be let for, bequeaths to B the lease and a sum of money. B refuses to accept the lease. He will not by this refusal forfeit the money."

There is no provision in the Succession Act corresponding to the third paragraph of this section. The reason lies in the fact that acceptance is an essential element of a valid gift (see S. 122), whereas a bequest is valid independent of the acceptance thereof by the legatee. A person who has accepted a gift in his favour and thus completed the gift cannot however, the Legislature has in the third paragraph of section provided an exception to the rule by giving such person an option to repudiate his own act under particular circumstances.

No such question of repudiation of the legatee's own act arises in the case of bequests, inasmuch as a valid bequest does not depend upon its being accepted by the legatee.

2. Scope of the section.—As has been seen in Note 2 on S. 35 the doctrine of election is based on three broad principles: firstly, that every person who affects by a legal instrument to dispose of property must be taken to intend all that he has expressed and that such intention must be given effect to; secondly, that a man shall not be permitted to blow "hot and cold" with reference to the same transaction; and thirdly, that he who receives advantage must bear the burden also : qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. This section is also based on the same principles.[1] Where a gift is in the form of a single transfer to the same person of several things of which one is, and the others are not, burdened by an obligation, prima facie the intention of the donor is that the gift shall go as a whole[2] and this intention must be given effect to by the donee.[3] The first paragraph accordingly provides that in such cases, the donee can take nothing unless he accepts the gift fully.

Where a gift is in the form of two or more separate and independent transfers to the same person of several things, it cannot be said prima facie that the donor intended that the gift should go as a whole.[4] The principles stated above do not, therefore, apply to such case and the donee can accept one of the gifts and refuse the other.[5] This is provided for in the second paragraph of the section.

3. Gifts subject to conditions.—The burden contemplated by the section is one that attaches to thing gifted, e.g., shares in a company, subject to heavy calls. This section does not apply where the thing gifted is itself not burdened by any obligation, but the instrument of gift imposes a condition that the donee should discharge certain liabilities. In such cases, the donee accepting the gift will take it subject to the condition and is bound to perform the condition.[1] This, however, is not by virtue of this section, but under general principles of law.

4. Onerous gift to disqualified person.—It has been seen in Note 8 on S. 7, that a person incompetent to contract cannot transfer property but can be a transferee of property. The third paragraph of this section shows that even a gift subject to a burden can be accepted by a person incompetent to contract without the intervention of a guardian.[1] But inasmuch as the incompetency of a person to contract prevents him from creating obligation as against himself, the law has reserved to him an option, on his becoming competent to contract, to repudiate his acceptance. If then he does repudiate his acceptance, he will of course have to return to the donor the thing gifted. If not, he will be bound to fulfil the obligation by which the gift is burdened.

The gift is complete from the moment of its acceptance. It is not in abeyance until the donee becomes competent to contract. Thus, the fact that the donee, after accepting the gift, dies before becoming competent to contract, will not affect the completeness of the gift.[2]

Until the donee actually repudiates his acceptance of the gift, he will be liable to fulfil the obligation imposed by the gift.[3]

5. Effect of acceptance of onerous gift.—Once onerous gift is accepted the donee becomes bound to fulfil the obligation by which the property gifted is burdened.[1]

1. Legislative changes.—The words "and liabilities of" have been newly added by S. 60 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (XX of 1929). The reason for the addition has been given by the Special Committee as follows :

> "The scope of this section is made clear by the addition of the word "liabilities" after the word 'debts.' A donee should be liable to the extent of the property in his hands not only for the debts of the donor, but also for his other liabilities."[1]

2. Scope of the section.—Where the whole extent of a right which A has, is transferred to B, the "translative" fact is called a "succession" and B is said to succeed to the right of A.[1] A universal succession takes place when the sum total of a man's rights and liabilities, called in Roman law, universitates juris, is transferred to another. The Roman law recognised many forms of universal succession under which the whole of a man's property, whether consisting of rights in rem or rights in personam or of both combined, passed to another; and with the property or assets, bona activa, passed also the liabilities, bona passiva.[2] Under the English law, a universal succession is recognised only in the case of the death or bankruptcy of a person or the confiscation of his estate by the State. It cannot be brought about by the act of parties. This section is a departure from the English law in that it recognises a universal succession by gift.

The object of this section, like that of S. 53, is to prevent the rights of creditors from being defeated by their debtors disposing of their properties. But there are important differences between the two provisions :

(1) Section 53 deals with a transfer of immovable property by a debtor, whereas this section deals with gifts of both moveable and immovable property.

(2) Section 53 deals with transfers made with intent to defeat or delay creditors, whereas this section does not require any such intention.

(3) Under S. 53 the transfer itself is voidable at the option of the creditor or creditors defeated or delayed whereas under this section the gift cannot be avoided but the creditors can recover their debts from the donee.

As the Law Commissioners observed in their Report of 1879 :

> "Gifts of one's whole property to a relation or friend are not uncommon before an execution or in anticipation of insolvency. For such cases of fraud S. 53 of the revised bill would provide when the property is land. But an universal gift may conceivably be honest and comprise moveable property. It should therefore, we think, be specially provided for."

This section is also in accordance with the principle enunciated by the maxim of equity, qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus (he who derives the advantage ought to sustain the burden). There is no compulsion on the donee to accept a gift made to him. If he finds that the property is burdened with too much debts he is free to reject the gift. But if he accepts the entire assets of the donor, it is only just and equitable that he should share the liabilities of the donor.[3]

3. "Where a gift consists."—A gift is clearly different from a trust. In a trust, the trustees get no benefit for themselves and even if the deed of trust comprises all the property of the author of the trust, the trustees would not be liable personally for the debts of the author of the trust.[1]

derer and this section cannot apply to such a transaction.[2] But the mere fact that the word "surrender" is used in an instrument is not conclusive on the question. It may really be a gift under the guise of a surrender. Thus, where a Hindu widow purported to surrender her interest in favour of a person who was not the next reversioner jointly with the next reversioner, it was held that the transaction was really a universal gift within the meaning of this section, and not merely a surrender as contemplated by the Hindu law.[3] In the undermentioned case,[4] the High Court of Calcutta has, however, assumed that a surrender by a Hindu female in favour of her next reversioners is a universal gift within the meaning of this section. It is submitted that this view is not correct. But the actual decision in the case holding the reversioners liable for the debts of the surrenderer, may be supported independently of this section, on the ground that they had expressly undertaken to pay such debts.

4. "Of the donor's whole property."—The section applies only where the gift is of the donor's whole property. If any portion of the donor's property is excluded from the gift the section will not apply, no matter what the value of the property excluded is or whether it is moveable or immovable property.[1] It was held in the undermentioned case,[2] where after a gift of the whole of the properties of the donor, there was a compromise between the donor and the donee, whereby the former was given back a land for which he was to pay rent to the donee, and which was to return to the donee in the event of the donor dying without issue, that this fact did not prevent him from being a universal donee. Mukerji, J., rested his decision on the fact that "for all practical purposes the applicant holds the entire property of Kumar Singh (donor)." The decision may also be supported on the ground that transactions subsequent to the gift will not affect the nature of the gift when made.

5. Liability of universal donee.—The liability of a universal donee under this section is similar to that of the legal representative of a deceased person in respect of the liabilities of the latter, under Ss. 50 and 52 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is limited to the extent of the property received by him.[1] The words "personally liable....to the extent of the property comprised therein" show that the liability is to be enforced in the first instance against the property received under the gift, but that if the donee has disposed it of to any extent, for purposes other than the discharge of such liability, it is to be enforced against the donee personally.

The liability under this section is independent of any condition expressed in the gift that the donee should pay the debts of the donor.[1a] Where such a condition is expressed in the instrument of gift (which need not be of the donor's whole property), the donee will be bound, if he accepts the gift to pay the debts, and this liability is not limited to the extent of the property received by him.[2]

A universal donee cannot escape liability by reason merely of the fact that the donor has, after the date of the gift, made part payments towards the debt or acknowledged it, and thus kept the debt alive.[3]

In the undermentioned case[4] where the donor owed two debts to the same person, one a mortgage-debt and the other an unsecured debt and the donee of the whole of the donor's property sought to redeem the mortgage-debt only, it was held that the mortgagee was entitled to tack on the unsecured debt also to the mortgage-debt and claim that both should be paid.

Where after a valid gift of his whole property, the donor was adjudicated an insolvent, it was held that the fact that the donee was liable for the debts of the insolvent would not authorise the Court acting under S. 4 of the Provincial Insolvency Act, to sell the properties in the hands of the donee for payment of the debts.[5]

Where a Hindu widow gifts her whole property to her reversioners, who make a part payment towards the mortgage-debt of the donor, the universal donees cannot take advantage of the widow's death and challenge the mortgage as reversioners. The reason is, they do not succeed to the property as reversioners; the property was theirs before the death of the widow.[6]

Position of universal legatee compared with that of universal donee : As far as the liability is concerned the position of a universal legatee and that of a universal donee are practically the same. In the case of a universal donee it was necessary to provide for his liability under this section as otherwise in case of personal liabilities where the persons making the gift were still alive, the transferee by gift of his property would escape all liability. It was not necessary to make a similar provision in the Succession Act where the estate of the deceased must be deemed to be the balance after all the liabilities are paid up.[7]

6. Muhammadan law.—By virtue of S. 129 this section does not affect any rule of Muhammadan law. But there is no rule of Muhammadan law in conflict with this section. The section will, therefore, apply to gifts by Muhammadans or in favour of Muhammadans.[1]

A hiba-bil-ewaz i.e., a gift for consideration is really not a gift at all and consequently this section has no application to such gifts.[2]

a. Home Department No. 61/40—Judicial, Dated 16th November 1940.—In exercise of the powers conferred by the fourth paragraph of Section 1 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (IV of 1882), the Central Government is pleased to extend Section 129 of the said Act to the following areas in the Province of Delhi, namely:
(a) Area within the jurisdiction of the Delhi Municipal Committee;
(b) Area within the jurisdiction of the New Delhi Municipal Committee;
(c) Area within the jurisdiction of the Notified Area Committee, Civil Lines; and

1. Legislative changes.—The words "or, save as provided by S. 123, any rule of Hindu or Buddhist law" were omitted from the original section, by S. 61 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929 (XX of 1929). The reasons for the omission were stated by the Special Committee :

> "Apart from the provisions of S. 123, S. 129 saves all rules of Hindu and Buddhist law relating to gifts. The provisions of Chapter VII relating to gifts are based on general principles and do not conflict with the rules of Hindu or Buddhist law. The Government of Burma does not object to the omission of the word 'Buddhist' from the section. We propose to omit the reference to Hindu and Buddhist law."

See also the undermentioned case.[1]

2. Scope of the section.—This section saves from the operation of the provisions of this chapter gifts in contemplation of death and declares that such provisions shall not affect any rule of Muhammadan law. Where there is no rule of Muhammadan law inconsistent with any of the provisions of the chapter, those provisions will directly apply even where the transaction is between Muhammadans.[1] But where a rule of the Muhammadan law is in conflict with any provision in this chapter, the former will prevail over the latter.[2]

A Provincial Government has, under S. 1 of the Act, power to extend any part of this Act, to any territory under its administration, to which the Act did not originally apply. But the Provincial Government cannot under that provision extend particular sections of the Act so as to give them an operation different from that which they have in the Act itself read as a whole. Where it was argued, that the Burma Government had extended only S. 123 of the Act to Burma and not S. 129, and that, therefore, even a gift by a Muhammadan was governed by S. 123 of the Act, their Lordships of the Privy Council observed[3]:

> "The power to extend any part of the Act to Burma did not authorise the Local Government to extend particular sections of the Act, so as to give those sections a different operation from that which they had in the Act itself read as a whole and to abrogate in the area to which the extension applied a rule of Muhammadan law till then in force there as to which the Legislature had expressly provided that it was to remain unaffected by the Act."

It may be noted that this section has been, by a notification dated 16th November 1940, extended to the areas within the jurisdiction of the Delhi Municipal Committee, the New Delhi Municipal Committee, the Notified Area Committee, Civil Lines and the Notified Area Committee, Fort.[4]

3. Gift in contemplation of death.—A gift in contemplation of death is known in the Roman Civil law as donatio mortis causa. Such gifts are now governed entirely by the Succession Act, 1925. Section 191 of that Act provides as follows :

> "(1) A man may dispose, by gift made in contemplation of death, of any moveable property which he could dispose of by will.
> (2) A gift is said to be made in contemplation of death where a man, who is ill and expects to die shortly of his illness, delivers[1] to another the possession of any moveable property to keep as a gift in case the donor shall die of that illness.
> (3) Such a gift may be resumed by the giver; and shall not take effect if he recovers from the illness during which it was made; nor if he survives the person to whom it was made."[1a]

A gift of the above nature is the middle point between a gift inter vivos and a legacy.[2] "It is like gift inter vivos in presupposing an immediate increase in the potentiality of the donee by the donor, and hence sharply distinguishes itself from the legacy. But added to this distinctive mark is another which not less sharply distinguishes it from the ordinary donation and approximates it to the legacy—that of being actually perfected by the death of the giver."[3]

A gift in expectation of suicide cannot be said to be one made in contemplation of death for the purposes of this section.[4]

Whatever strictness is required in the proof of a testamentary disposition is at least equally required in cases of gifts in contemplation of death."[5]

4. Hindu and Buddhist law—Gifts in contemplation of death.—Under the strict Hindu law, a gift or a gratuitous contract made by a person afflicted with an incurable distemper is void. The incapacity is attached to the mind agitated with fever, anger or lust or the pain of an incurable disease.[1] The idea is that under the above circumstances a person cannot form a rational estimate as regards the consequences of his action.[2] But this strict rule of Hindu law was never followed in practice. In the undermentioned case[3] Mr. Justice Holloway held that a gift even during a mortal illness was valid provided it fulfilled all the requisites of a valid gift under the Hindu law. He observed : "To allow a gift in form of a will to be valid and deny that validity to one much nearer the nature of a gift inter vivos, would be logically impossible. To reject the nearer and accept the more remote cannot, certainly, be vindicated."

Under the Buddhist law also a death-bed gift was invalid,[4] the underlying idea of the rule being that if such gift is recognised it would enable a Buddhist to defy his own personal law and practically to dispose of his property by methods which in effect would be equivalent to and operate as a will.[5]

These cases are now of no importance in view of the amendment of the section by the omission of the words "or, save as provided by S. 123, any rule of Hindu or Buddhist law" and also by the enactment of S. 191 of the Succession Act, 1925.

Muhammadan law of gifts is applied as being in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the "rule of Muhammadan law" referred to in this section, refers to the rules of Muhammadans specifically declared by the Legislature to be applicable to Muhammadans or whether it includes also the rules which are applied as being in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience. In Ma Asha v. B. K. Haldar,[2] it was held by a Full Bench of the High Court of Rangoon that S. 129 did not except from the operation of the chapter those rules of Muhammadan law which were applied by Courts only as being in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience. In a subsequent decision of the same Court in Maung Gyi v. Maung Saung,[3] Mr. Justice Leach, while feeling himself bound by Ma Asha's case, observed as follows :

> "The operation of S. 129, Transfer of Property Act, is not limited. It says that nothing in the chapter shall be deemed to affect any rule of Muhammadan law. It does not differentiate between rules of Muhammadan law made specifically applicable under a local statute and rules of Muhammadan law which can be applied on the ground that they are in accordance with justice, equity and good conscience. The intention of the Legislature in inserting S. 129 was to preserve the Muhammadan law of gifts so far as gifts by Muhammadans were concerned, and the section has, in my opinion, this effect. I consider that the Legislature could never have intended the section to apply only in cases where Muhammadan law was made expressly applicable by local statute. But the matter does not rest there. There are the decisions of the Privy Council in the cases to which I have referred and unanimity of opinion in the High Courts of India on the question. For these reasons I should have been prepared to hold that Muhammadan law applied without any restriction to gifts by Muhammadans in this Province, but I consider that I am bound by the decision in Ma Asha's case."[4]

See also the undermentioned cases.[5]

Where the Muhammadan law was, under the Bengal, Agra and Assam Civil Courts Act, 1887, declared applicable, it was held by the High Court of Patna, that this section did not affect any rule of Muhammadan law, so declared applicable.[6]

The Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) Application Act, XXVI of 1937, now declares inter alia that in all matters of gift, the personal law of the Muhammadans shall be the rule of decision in cases where the parties are Muslims. This Act is applicable to the whole of British India except the N.-W. Frontier Province[7] and renders the conflict of views above referred to, of little importance.

TRANSFER OF ACTIONABLE CLAIMS.

Transfer of actionable claim.

130. (1) The transfer of an actionable claim [b][whether with or without consideration] shall be effected only by the execution of an instrument in writing signed by the transferor or his duly authorized agent, [c][* * *] shall be complete and effectual upon the execution of such instrument, and thereupon all the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, shall vest in the transferee, whether such notice of the transfer as is hereinafter provided be given or not:

Provided that every dealing with the debt or other actionable claim by the debtor or other person from or against whom the transferor would, but for such instrument of transfer as aforesaid, have been entitled to recover or enforce such debt or other actionable claim, shall (save where the debtor or other person is a party to the transfer or has received express notice thereof as hereinafter provided) be valid as against such transfer.

(2) The transferee of an actionable claim may, upon the execution of such instrument of transfer as aforesaid, sue or institute proceedings for the same in his own name without obtaining the transferor's consent to such suit or proceedings and without making him a party thereto.

Exception.*—Nothing in this section applies to the transfer of a marine or fire policy of insurance, [d][or affects the provisions of section 38 of the Insurance Act, 1938].

1. Legislative changes.

(1) By the Transfer of Property Act, II of 1900, the whole of this chapter was substituted for the original chapter on actionable claims.

(2) Section 130 of the original chapter defined "actionable claim" and S. 131 provided as follows:

"No transfer of any debt or any beneficial interest in moveable property shall have any operation against the debtor or against the person in whom the property is vested, until express notice of the transfer is given to him, unless he is a party to or otherwise aware of such transfer; and every dealing by such debtor or person not being a party to or otherwise aware of, and not having received express notice of, a transfer, with the debt or property, shall be valid as against such transfer.

Illustration.

A owes money to B, who transfers the debt to C. B then demands the debt from A who, having no notice of the transfer, pays B. The payment is valid, and C cannot sue A for the debt."

By the Transfer of Property Act, II of 1900, the definition of "actionable claim" was taken over to S. 3, and a new S. 130 was introduced which ran as follows:

"The transfer of an actionable claim shall be effected only by the execution of an instrument in writing signed by the transferor or his duly authorized agent and shall be complete and effectual upon the execution of such instrument, and thereupon all the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, shall vest in the transferee, whether such notice of the transfer as is hereinafter provided be given or not."

By the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XXXVIII of 1925, the words "notwithstanding anything contained in S. 123" were added after the words "authorized agent and" in sub-s. (1). But by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XX of 1929, those words were omitted and the words "whether with or without consideration" were inserted after the words "actionable claim" occurring in the beginning of the sub-section. (See Note 11.)

By S. 121 of the Insurance Act, IV of 1938, the following words and figures were added to the exception of the section: "or affects the provisions of S. 38 of the Insurance Act, 1938." (See Note 23.)

2. Scope of the section.—This chapter enacts the general principles of law regarding transfers of actionable claims[1] and its principal provisions are presumably intended to discourage traffic in litigation.[2]

English law—

Choses in action in English law are classified as legal or equitable according to the mode of procedure necessary for reducing them into possession.[3] Legal choses in action are those that can be recovered or enforced by action at law, such as a debt or a claim on a policy of Insurance. Equitable choses in action, on the other hand, are those which were formerly enforced by a suit in equity and arise out of the property and rights in respect of which the Court of Chancery formerly had, and the Chancery division of the High Court now has, the exclusive or peculiar jurisdiction.[4]

At Common Law originally a chose in action, except in cases of annuity, was not assignable.[5] This rule was broken in from time to time and several cases of assignment were recognised as valid.[6] Courts of equity on the other hand recognised assignment of choses in action from the earliest times.[7] If the chose in action was equitable the assignee could sue in equity without joining the assignor as a party to his suit,[8] but if the chose in action was legal, the assignee was required to join the assignor either as a plaintiff or defendant to his suit in equity even when the assignment was absolute on the face of it. This was necessary in order, primarily, to bind him and prevent his suing at law and also to allow him to dispute the assignment if he thought fit. This was a fortiori the case when the assignment was by way of security or charge because the assignor, in that case had a right to redeem.[9] Further, the assignee could not give a valid discharge for the claim unless expressly empowered by the assignor in that behalf.[10]

In order to remove this state of affairs and to simplify the remedy in favour of the assignee and to protect the original debtor or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to claim the chose in action, sub-s. (6) of S. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873[11] provided as follows:

"Any absolute assignment, by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only), of any debt or other legal chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, trustee or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to receive or claim such debt or chose in action, shall be, and be deemed to have been, effectual in law (subject to all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if this Act had not been passed), to pass and transfer the legal right to such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal and other remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge for the same without the concurrence of the assignor: Provided always, that if the debtor, trustee or other person liable in respect of such debt or chose in action shall have had notice that such assignment is disputed by the assignor or anyone claiming under him, or of any other opposing or conflicting claims to such debt or chose in action, he shall be entitled, if he think fit, to call upon the several persons making claim thereto to interplead concerning the same, or he may, if he think fit, pay the same into the High Court of Justice under and in conformity with the provisions of the Acts for the relief of trustees."

(The sub-section has now been repealed and re-enacted with verbal changes in S. 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V, C. 20).)

Section 25 (6) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, however, did not create any new rights. It only afforded a new mode of enforcing old rights. It enabled the assignee to sue in his own name in a Court of law without the concurrence of the assignor. It did not make assignable choses in action which were not assignable in equity before. Nor did it impair the efficacy of equitable assignments which would previously have been valid.[12] So even after the passing of the sub-section equitable assignments are given effect to.[13]

The words "debt or other legal chose in action" used in the sub-section mean "debt or right which the common law looked on as not assignable by reason of its being a chose in action but which a Court of equity dealt with as being assignable."[14]

It will be noted that statutory assignment under the Act must be absolute and not by way of a charge[15] and must be in writing.[16] It takes effect only from the date of notice of the assignment to the debtor[17]. Further the assignee can sue in his own name for recovery of the claim. An equitable assignment, on the other hand, need not be absolute[18] or in writing.[19] It takes effect from the date of the assignment, notice being necessary only for the purpose of binding the debtor.[20]

The section contains a special scheme which has some of the features both of the English Common Law and of the principles of equity.[21] In Sadasook v. Hoare Miller,[22] Rankin, J., observed as follows:

> "In construing Ss. 130 and 131 of the Transfer of Property Act, it has to be remembered that they contain a very special scheme which must be regarded as a whole in itself. At common law a chose in action was not assignable, in equity it was freely assignable upon certain principles as to notice. The Indian Legislature in 1900 has composed a new scheme which has some of the features of both, and, as I read S. 130 it says this that the law while regarding the transfer of an actionable claim as valid if effected in a certain manner, will not undertake to enforce against a debtor the assignment except upon the terms that the debtor may arrange with his original creditor unless and until he has received, in writing a particular kind of notice."

This section is not inapplicable to Muhammadans so as to take a gift by a Muhammadan of an actionable claim, out of the operation of the section.[23]

3. "Transfer."—The word "transfer" is used in this section in the same wide sense as that which is attributed to the word "convey" by the definition to be found in S. 205 (ii) of the English law of Property Act, 1925.[1] Thus, the section covers absolute transfers of actionable claims as well as transfers by way of security.[2] This is also made clear by the second illustration to the section in which the assignment of a life policy for securing the payment of an existing or future debt is assumed to be valid.[3] The transfer of an actionable claim, like any other transfer, may also be made conditionally.[3a] In the undermentioned case[4] an endowment policy was assigned by the assured in favour of his wife by an endorsement on it and the assignment was duly communicated to the insurance company. The endorsement recited that in the event of the wife predeceasing the assured or in the event of his surviving the date on which the policy was to become mature, the benefits of the policy together with the rights to recover the money thereunder would revert to the assured. It was held that this section applied to such a transfer, because, so long as the assignee's interest existed she had the whole interest and there was nothing in the terms of the section or in the principles underlying it to exclude the transfer of such a kind from its scope.

4. There must be present transfer of an existing actionable claim. —The word "transfer" means a present transfer.[1] A promise by the debtor to pay money to his creditor, when he, the debtor, might receive a debt due to him by a third person, does not constitute an assignment of the debt so as to charge the debt in the hands of the third person.[2] An undertaking by the debtor in the following terms: "I will deposit at your shop all cheques that I may get from the P.W. Department" or "I will be giving you cheques in satisfaction of the money due to you" has been held not to constitute a present assignment of the debt but to be merely an agreement to assign in future; the person in whose favour the agreement is made has no lien on the cheques.[3]

It is necessary not only that there should be a present transfer, but also that the actionable claim transferred is in existence, at the time of the transfer.[4] As was observed by Braund, J., in In the matter of Aviet Stephens.[5]:

> "Section 130 (1) in its terms appears to point to an immediate interest of some sort passing. And that while it is in every way appropriate to an accruing, conditional or contingent debt, it cannot be reconciled with a debt which does not exist at all. In the three first cases an interest already exists which may or may not become a present debt . . . . . But a non-existent debt in the sense of a liability to become due in future from an unascertained person and to arise out of a relationship not yet established obviously imports no present interest at all and is not easy to fit into the intention of S. 130 (1) of the Act."

A share of a partner in a partnership and the right to recover it is an actionable claim which is assignable under this section. But a right of a partner to a rendition of accounts is not an actionable claim and cannot be assigned.[6]

A vendor's right to recover purchase-money from the purchaser is an actionable claim transferable under this section.[7] Similarly the buyer's right under S. 61 of the Sale of Goods Act (1930) to recover back the price paid under a contract of a sale on failure of its consideration is an actionable claim transferable under this section.[8]

A fixed deposit in a bank is not a deposit of specie but a debt or an actionable claim and a transfer of the same can only be made by an instrument in writing as required by this section.[9]

5. Distinction between transfer of a debt and a novation.—A transfer of a debt must be distinguished from a novation of contract. Section 62 of the Contract Act deals with novation of contracts and runs as follows :

> "If the parties to a contract agree to substitute a new contract for it, or to rescind or alter it, the original contract need not be performed.
>
>
> (a) A owes money to B under a contract. It is agreed between A, B and C that B shall thenceforth accept C as his debtor, instead of A. The old debt of A to B is at an end, and a new debt from C to B has been contracted.
>
> (b) A owes B 10,000 rupees. A enters into an arrangement with B, and gives B a mortgage of his (A's) estate for 5,000 rupees in place of the debt of 10,000 rupees. This is a new contract and extinguishes the old.
>
> (c) A owes B 1,000 rupees under a contract. B owes C 1,000 rupees. B orders A to credit C with 1,000 rupees in his books, but C does not assent to the arrangement. B still owes C 1,000 rupees, and no new contract has been entered into."

The effect of a novation is thus not to make any assignment[1] but to extinguish the old contract, and bring about a new one either between the same parties or between one of them and a third party. It is a matter of consent of all the parties concerned.[2]

In a transfer of an actionable claim under this section, the liability of the debtor is neither substituted by any new liability nor is it transferred to any one else. The claim against the debtor is merely transferred to a third person, and is not a matter of any consent on the part of the debtor at all.[3]

6. Assignment of rents and profits and assignment of lessor's right of reversion under a lease.—A transfer of the rents and profits due to a person will be an assignment of an actionable claim requiring a document in writing under this section. But where the reversion in a lease is transferred by the lessor to another person, the latter's right to collect the rents and profits due by the lessee is part of the reversionary right transferred and can be claimed by him without a separate transfer in writing of such rents and profits. As observed by Venkataramana Rao, J., in the undermentioned case[1]:

> "There is always a distinction between an assignment of the rents and profits and a lease of a reversion. In the case of an assignment of rents and profits, all that the assignee will be entitled to is the right to realize the rents and profits by virtue of the assignment in his favour, but in the case of a reversion it is not merely the right to recover the rents and profits that are transferred to him but also the rights which the lessor had on the date of the reversion, for example, his right to recover possession immediately on the expiry of the previous term and if before the expiry of the term by virtue of any forfeiture, the lessor had the right to re-enter, the right of such re-entry."

7. Assignment of beneficial interest in moveable property.—See Note 24 on S. 3 and the undermentioned cases.[1]

8. Assignment of part of debt.—In England there is a difference of opinion as to whether at law a part of a debt can be validly assigned, though the general trend of opinion is that it cannot be so assigned. In equity, however, such an assignment is valid and constitutes the assignee a creditor of the original debtor[1], and he can enforce his rights against the debtor provided he makes the persons entitled to the other portion of the debt, parties to the suit.[2]

There is nothing in this section which prohibits the transfer of a part of a debt. But there is a conflict of opinion on the point. In the undermentioned cases[3] it was held that a part of the debt cannot be validly assigned for the reason that a debtor cannot be harassed by different creditors attempting to enforce parts of a single debt. In the case noted below[4] the High Court of Patna has held that where A transfers a part of a debt to B who enforces the same in a suit against the debtor, O.2 R.2 of the Civil Procedure Code will prevent A from suing the debtor for the remaining portion of the debt, that A's right to the remaining portion of the debt is not therefore an actionable claim since it is not a claim which the Civil Courts recognise as affording grounds for granting relief, and that A cannot transfer the remaining part as an actionable claim. A contrary view, namely, that an assignment of even a part of the debt is valid, has been held in other cases.[5] It is submitted that the last view is to be preferred.

8a. Assignment of rights under a contract .—See Note 17 under S.6.

9. Debts due to a joint Hindu family.—It is the essential characteristic of a joint Hindu family that no member is entitled to a definite share in the joint family property. No assignment is therefore necessary where one coparcener retires from the membership of the joint family business and renounces his share therein. Any member can drop out of the business and the business will thenceforward belong to the other members who remain in the family. Thus, if there are debts due to a joint Hindu family from a certain person, the member renouncing his share in the debts need not execute a formal deed of transfer in favour of the remaining members.[1] So also, where in a partition of a joint Hindu family, a debt evidenced by a pronote falls to the share of a particular member, he can sue to recover the amount due under the pronote without an assignment under this section. The right to sue is not dependent upon the assignment and the suit, in such a case, is regarded as a suit on the original debt irrespective of the pronote.[2]

10. Transfer by operation of law.—The section does not affect a transfer of an actionable claim by operation of law or by, or in execution of, a decree or order of Court, as such transfers are expressly saved by S. 2, cl. (d).[1] See also Note 6 under section 2.

11. "Whether with or without consideration."—In English law, an assignment at law, may validly be made without consideration. But equitable assignments not falling within the statute are given effect to in Courts of Equity only if supported by consideration.[1]

The words "whether with or without consideration" in this section make it clear that a gift of an actionable claim can validly be made under this section.[2] The said words did not exist in the section before the year 1929.

It was, however, held that the section was wide enough to cover transfer with or without consideration[2a] and that gifts of actionable claims were not governed by Chap. VII which relates to gifts generally but by the special rules laid down in Chap. VIII for the transfer of actionable claims.[3] Chapter VII was held inapplicable to gifts of actionable claims for another reason also. An actionable claim, though a moveable property, was not such a moveable property as could be transferred by mere delivery under S. 123. The provisions in S. 123 that delivery may be made in the same way as goods sold and delivered showed that what was dealt with under that section was a gift of tangible property such as a horse or a book and not an intangible property like a book-debt.[4]

By the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XXXVIII of 1925, the clause "notwithstanding anything contained in S. 123" was inserted after the words "authorised agent and," the object of the amendment being to give effect to representations made by certain insurance companies that gifts of life policies involved considerable hardships, as, under section 123 they were required to be made by registered instruments. By the insertion of the above words, however, doubts appear to have arisen as to whether the words applied to gifts of actionable claims made by Muhammadans. In order to remove these doubts, therefore, the words "notwithstanding anything contained in S. 123" were omitted from the section by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, XX of 1929, and the words "whether with or without consideration" were inserted after the words "The transfer of an actionable claim."[5]

An idol not being a living person within the meaning of S. 5, a dedication of property to an idol is not a gift within the meaning of the Transfer of Property Act. A dedication of an actionable claim to an idol, therefore, is not governed by this section and may be made orally.[6] (See section 5 also.)

12. Form of assignment.—The section requires that the transfer of an actionable claim shall be effected only by the execution of an instrument in writing.[1]

Under the old S. 131 it was held that a transfer in writing was not necessary as there were no words to that effect in the section.[2] An assignment by way of a trust deed is valid.[2a]

The object of reducing the transfer to writing is to put the arrangement entered into between the parties beyond dispute.[3] Thus, in Raman Chetty v. Nagarathna Naicker,[4] it was observed:

> "The intention of the Legislature in amending this chapter of the Transfer of Property Act, was to bring the law in India generally into conformity with the law in England, which under the Judicature Act requires assignments of chose in action to be in writing, a provision which is, in my opinion, highly necessary for the benefit of the other party to the contract who ought not to be embarrassed by mere oral allegations of transfer which may easily be distinguished and upon which it may be very difficult for him to act with any degree of safety to himself."

As transfers by way of charge on or hypothecation of actionable claims fall under this section, such transfers also must be effected by execution of an instrument in writing.[5] Thus, a mere deposit of a life policy[6] or a deposit of securities lying with the creditor, by the creditor[7] will not create any charge on the life policy or debts due by the debtor.

13. No particular words are necessary to constitute assignment.— Although a transfer of an actionable claim is required to be in writing, the section does not require the transfer to be in any particular form or to be couched in technical language, provided the words used sufficiently indicate the transferor's intention to transfer the claim due to him to the transferee.[1] In William Brandt's Sons v. Dunlop Rubber Co.,[2] Lord Macnaughten observed:

> "The Lord Chief Justice came to the conclusion that the document did not on the face of it, purport to be an assignment nor use the language of an assignment. An equitable assignment does not always take that form. It may be addressed to the debtor. It may be couched in the language of command. It may be a courteous request. It may assume the form of mere permission. The language is immaterial if the meaning is plain. All that is necessary is that the debtor should be given to understand that the debt has been made over by the creditor to some third person."

The following are all illustrations of valid assignments of actionable claim:

(1) Endorsement on an instrument which represents the debt.[3]

(2) Endorsement on a money bond to the effect 'I have sold the document,'[4] or to the effect, 'the balance due should be paid into the hands of my son.'[5]

(3) A direction in writing to pay the amount due on an instrument endorsed on the instrument by the payee thereof coupled with the delivery of the instrument so endorsed to the person to whom the payment is directed.[6] But a mere acknowledgment of the payment by the payee is not an assignment under the section, there being no operative words of transfer.[7]

(4) A partition list allotting a pronote to a particular member of a joint family.[8]

(5) An assignment by way of an entry made in a statement of accounts is sufficient.[9]

(6) A letter given by a person to another, directing the latter to receive from the former's debtor the amount due to him under an instalment bond.[10]

(7) Where there is a verbal transfer of an actionable claim on a certain date and the transfer is reduced to writing the next day and the instrument refers to the transfer as having been made on the previous day, the instrument is a deed of transfer and cannot be held otherwise simply because it is expressed in the past tense.[11]

(8) An arrangement by all the partners, on the dissolution of a firm, that some of them would be entitled to the debt due to the firm.[12]

(9) Where a sum of money is lying with a banker as a deposit in the name of one A but by a subsequent arrangement in writing between A and B it is agreed that a portion of the deposit should be transferred to B while the other portion should go to the benefit of A, the arrangement operates as an assignment of an actionable claim.[13]

(10) A was awarded compensation in a Magistrate's Court and the money was kept in Court deposit. B brought a suit against A for a certain amount and effected an attachment before judgment of the deposit. On the date of hearing, A admitted the claim of B and requested the Court that out of the deposit in the Magistrate's Court, the amount of B's claim be sent for and given to B in satisfaction of his claim. Thereupon, the Court passed an order that a decree under O. 12 R. 6, Civil Procedure Code, be passed, and the sum be requisitioned from the Court of the Magistrate. It was held that the declaration made by A and given effect to by the Court amounted to assignment.[14]

(11) A member of a Provident Fund executed a trust-deed whereby he assigned to himself and another person, as trustees, the amount of money standing to his credit at that time and other monies to which he might become entitled as a subscriber of the fund on retirement from service. The deed further provided that the trustees would receive the money and pay the income thereof to the settlor during his life-time and after his death the whole sum was to be distributed among certain persons. The settlor had reserved the right to revoke or alter the trust at any time. It was held that there was a valid assignment by way of a trust-deed and that therefore the trust property passed to the trustees.[14a]

(12) An application by the assignor to the Court of Wards to take over management of the property including debts due to assignor, on behalf of the minor assignee is sufficient.[14b]

It is a well settled rule that title cannot pass by mere admission or relinquishment where the statute requires a deed of transfer. Therefore, under the section a mere admission or relinquishment by a person of his rights in an actionable claim would not be sufficient.[15] Thus, where A and C were partners of a firm and C executed a deed of release whereby he gave up his claim to the business of the firm and declared that thenceforth the partnership would be conducted by A and D, it was held that no title vested in A and D under this section as a deed of transfer was necessary.[16]

14. Registration not necessary.—The section only requires that the transfer should be in writing signed by the transferor, and not that it should be registered. No registration is therefore necessary for the transfer of an actionable claim.[1] The contrary view expressed in the undermentioned case,[2] without any reasons being assigned for the view, is not correct.

15. Agreement between debtor and creditor that debts would be paid from a fund in the hands of a third person, if assignment.—Under the English law an agreement between the debtor and the creditor that the debt owing shall be paid out of a specific fund coming to the debtor or an order given by a debtor to his creditor upon a person owing money or holding funds belonging to the giver of the order, directing such person to pay such funds to the creditor, operates as an equitable assignment of that part of the debt or funds to which the agreement or order relates.[1] Such an order or agreement would operate under this section also as a transfer of an actionable claim provided the requirement of this section as to writing is satisfied. Thus, an agreement between a debtor and a creditor that a particular debt should be paid from and out of a particular fund or money in the hands of a third person, would be an assignment of the debt.[2] So also, where, on an instrument executed by B in favour of A, A makes an endorsement directing B to pay C, and then delivers the instrument so endorsed to C, the transaction will be an assignment of the debt.[3] See also the undermentioned cases[4]. But a mere direction by A to his debtor B that he should pay C, does not amount to a transfer of the debt to C in the absence of any agreement between A and C that he should get the amount. It is merely an order for payment.[5] A applied to a credit society for loan and in his application gave his salary bills which would be due to him from his employee, as security. The society granted the application and a bond was executed by A in favour of the society, which, however, did not state that the loan would be paid up from his salary. A also wrote to his employer to pay the society such sums out of his salary as the society may apply for. It was held that this was not an equitable assignment of the salary in favour of the society.[6]

16. "Duly authorized agent."—The instrument of transfer under this section may be signed by the transferor or his duly authorised agent. The word "duly" must be taken to mean "lawfully." Where at the time of the transfer by the agent, he was not authorised to do so, but subsequently the principal ratifies the act, the ratification dates back retrospectively to the date of the transfer and cures the defect in the transfer. The transfer must be taken to have been made by an agent duly authorised in that behalf.[1]

17. Completeness of the transfer and notice to the debtor.—Under S. 131 as it stood prior to 1900,[1] transfer of an actionable claim was not complete until express notice was given to the debtor unless he was a party to the transfer or was otherwise aware of such transfer. In other words, the operation of the transfer was suspended until the required notice was given.[2] This was also the English law, under which the title of the assignee of a chose in action was not complete until the required notice was given, so that a subsequent assignee could obtain priority over a prior one, by the mere fact of his giving notice to the debtor.[3]

The present section has changed the law in this respect. A transfer of an actionable claim is now complete on the execution of the instrument signed by the transferor[4] and does not depend upon the giving of notice to the debtor.[5] The result under the present section is that if there are several transfers of the debts in favour of different persons, they take in the order of the dates of these transfers and not in the order of the dates on which notices were given to the debtor.[6]

A subsequent transferee without notice of the earlier transfer may, however, even now, obtain priority over the earlier transferee if the latter has been guilty of gross negligence or is barred by estoppel from setting up his rights.[7]

Although the title of the transferee becomes perfect on the execution of instrument of transfer without any notice to the debtor, a dealing by the debtor with the debt without notice of the transfer will, under the second paragraph of the section, be valid against the transferee.[8] Under the repealed S. 131, a dealing by the debtor, after the transfer was not valid against the transferee, if he was a party to the transfer or even if he was aware otherwise of the transfer, although he had received no express notice of the transfer.[9] Under the present section, however, a dealing by the debtor after the transfer will not be binding on the transferee only if the debtor was either a party to the transfer or had been given express notice of the transfer. A mere knowledge of the transfer is not sufficient.

The notice required by this section must be an express notice conforming to the provisions of S. 131.[9a] If the notice does not conform to the provisions of that section the debtor is not bound by it and is not debarred from treating the debt as payable to the original creditor.[10] After the receipt of notice, the debtor cannot refuse to pay the debt to the transferee; if he still makes payment to the transferor he is not absolved from liability to make payment to the transferee.[11] It was held in the undermentioned case[12] that after a notice is given to the debtor of the assignment he cannot make any payment to anyone else even under the order of the Court unless the assignee was a party to the proceeding in which the order is passed.

A conditional or qualified notice is, however, not invalid.[13] Thus, where A transfers a debt due to him by B to C and gives notice of the transfer to B but requests him to pay C only if the liability which forms the consideration of the transfer has not already been discharged by A himself the notice is 'valid' and B would be justified in paying A, if A after giving notice, represents to B that he has satisfied the claim of C and C himself takes no steps to realise the debt from B.[14]

The section, however, does not make any provision as to what the debtor is to do when the fact of the transfer or its validity and operation is disputed. The only safe course for him, in such a case, is not to pay the debt to anyone but to ask the claimants to interplead. If he pays one of them he does so at his peril and will be obliged to pay over again to the right person if the person to whom he paid the amount is found to have no title.[15]

The notice of transfer must be given to the debtor himself or some person duly authorised by him to receive such notice.[16]

The provisions of S. 130, however, presuppose a valid transfer. If the procedure laid down in this section is strictly followed but the transfer contravenes some other provisions of law, no rights under this section can pass from the transferor to the transferee.[17] Thus, if the object or consideration of the transfer is unlawful within the meaning of S. 23, Contract Act, the transfer will fail. (See S. 6.) So also where a debt is transferred with the object of defeating the creditors of the transferor, the creditors are not bound by the transfer and can treat the debt as still being the property of the transferor.[18] mortgagee, if available against transferee.—A mortgage debt is not an actionable claim,[1] and a transfer thereof is not governed by this section. A notice to the mortgagor is not necessary in order to render its assignment valid.[1a] But it is well recognised in England, that until he receives notice of the transfer, the mortgagor may validly make payments to the mortgagee (transferor) and to have credit for them against the transferee.[2] The same principle has been held to apply in this country also.[3] But other equities, such as a right to set off an independent claim against the mortgagee, have been held not to be available to the mortgagor.[4]

19. "All the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, shall vest in the transferee."—All rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, in respect of the actionable claim vest in the transferee.[1] In the undermeintioned case,[2] one Mangal Ram had executed in favour of one Mt. Suraj, a bond for Rs. 150. The bond contained a stipulation that the loan was to be repaid in yearly instalments of Rs. 5 without interest. It was also provided that if the debtor made default in payment of any instalment, the creditor could sue only for the one instalment. It was held that these stipulations were voidable by Mt. Suraj on the ground of undue influence and that a transferee of the bond from Mt. Suraj was also entitled to exercise the same option and avoid the stipulations.

As all the rights and remedies of the transferor in respect of the actionable claim transferred pass to the transferee, the transferee is after the date of the transfer, the only party entitled to sue the debtor or the other person for the recovery of the actionable claim.[3] The contrary view taken in the undermentioned case[4] to the effect that the transferor can maintain an action against the debtor or the other person for the benefit of the transferee appears to be incorrect in view of the express terms of the section.

Section 135 of the repealed Chapter VIII[5] provided that a buyer of an actionable claim could not, except in certain specified cases, claim from the debtor

5. The old Section 135 ran as follows:
"Where an actionable claim is sold, he against whom it is made is wholly discharged by paying to the buyer the price and incidental expenses of the sale, with interest on the price from the day that the buyer paid it.
Nothing in the former part of this section applies:—
(a) where the sale is made to the co-heir to, or co-proprietor of, the claim sold;
(b) where it is made to a creditor in payment of what is due to him;
(c) where it is made to the possessor of a property subject to the actionable claim;

anything more than what he paid for his purchase.[6] Under the present section it is clear that the transferee can claim the full amount due under the actionable claim even though he obtained his transfer in consideration of a lesser amount.

See also S. 134 Note 5.

20. Assignor's liability after the assignment.—Even though a payment made by the debtor, before notice of the assignment of the debt, to the assignor is valid against the assignee, the assignor has no right, as between himself and his assignee, to receive the debt after the date of the transfer. If he receives it he will be liable to pay it up to the assignee.[1] Nor can the assignor do anything in derogation of his transfer,[2] the principle being that a grantor cannot derogate from his own grant. Thus, in the undermentioned case[3] A and B, co-partners transferred to C all the co-partnership stock, debts, sums of money, etc. At the time of such transfer A had in his possession a bill of exchange payable to his order, the property of A and B as such co-partners. A made default in transferring the bill to C and later on incapacitated himself from so doing by parting with the bill. It was held that there was an implied covenant on the part of A not to do anything in derogation of the deed of transfer and that, as he acted in derogation of it, C could recover the amount of the bill from A. In another case[4] a deed of transfer of an actionable claim contained a clear and unambiguous statement that no part payment of any sort had ever been made to the transferor; there was also a provision that the transferee should collect the amount of the claim by recourse to litigation if he could not recover it otherwise. The transferee having failed to recover the debt from the debtor sued the transferor for the price he paid for the transfer and for the costs of litigation against the debtor. It was held that the statement in the deed of transfer was a guarantee that the claim was in full force and it was also clear that the litigation was within the contemplation of parties and so the costs of litigation also. The transferee was, therefore, entitled to get a decree against the transferor not only for the price he paid but also for the costs of the suit against the debtor, and of the appeal and second appeal.

21. The right of a tenant in Malabar to compensation.—The right of a tenant in Malabar to compensation for improvements made on the tenancy land, is of a peculiar nature. It is dependent on the state of accounts existing at the time the question of compensation comes to be settled between the tenant and the landlord as to the claims which the landlord has against the tenant on account of rents or other dues payable under the lease. Such a right, however, is analogous to an actionable claim and a transfer of such right by the tenant to a third person cannot affect the rights of the landlord unless he has notice of the transfer when he accepts the surrender of the property leased and settles the account with the tenant[1]

22. Sub-section (2).—As seen in Note 19 after the execution of the instrument of transfer the transferee is the only party entitled to maintain action against the debtor or other person for the recovery of the actionable claim. The sub-section makes it clear that the transferee is not required to obtain the consent of the transferor to the suit or proceeding against the debtor or other person and need not make the transferor a party to such suit or proceeding.[1]

23. Exception.—Transfers of fire and marine policies have been excepted from the general provisions of this section.[1] A transfer of fire insurance policy is governed by the special rule contained in S. 135, while a transfer of marine insurance policy is now specifically provided for in Ss. 130A and 135A which have been inserted by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, VI of 1944.

Until the amendment of the Exception in 1938 (See Note 1) transfers of life policies were required to be made in accordance with the provisions of this section.[2] But by the amendment of 1938 it is now provided that this section will not affect the provisions of S. 38 of the Insurance Act, 1938, which now provides for the transfer of life policies. However the rights and remedies of a transferee of a life policy existing prior to the commencement of the Insurance Act, 1938, are not affected by the provisions of S. 38 of the Act[3] (see cl. (6) of S. 38, Insurance Act, 1938).

24. The principle of "caveat emptor" applies to the purchase of an actionable claim.—It has been held that the principle of "caveat emptor" applies to the purchase of an actionable claim.[1] Thus, where a person held a promissory note for a certain amount and was paid off by the executant, but after the death of such person his widow sold it in good faith, not knowing that it was paid off, it was held that the principle of "Caveat emptor" applied, and that the pur-

25. Law in the Punjab.— The Act does not apply to the Punjab.[1] The technical provisions contained in this section as to the requirement of writing for the transfer of an actionable claim have not been applied in that province.[2] The Courts are guided in such matters by the rules of justice, equity and good conscience.[3] In the undermentioned case[4] the Court applied the provisions of S. 25, sub-s. (6) of the English Judicature Act, 1873, as being in consonance with justice, equity and good conscience. In another case where a part of a debt was assigned, it was held that if this section enabled the transfer of a part of the debt, the principle underlying the section may be applied to the cases arising in the Punjab also, and that if it did not, then even according to the rules of justice, equity and good conscience, the assignee's rights were enforceable where the assignor and all other persons interested were made parties and there was no question of any harassment of the debtor by a multiplicity of proceedings.[5]

1. Legislative changes.—Before the insertion of this section and S. 135A by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, VI of 1944, assignment of rights under marine or fire policy of insurance was governed by the old S. 135. The reference to marine insurance policy was omitted from S. 135 by the above amending Act. Regarding the change, the reasons given were as follows:

> "The rules and principles governing a marine insurance policy being materially different from those governing a fire insurance policy, it is very unsatisfactory to accord the same treatment in the matter of assignment to both categories of policies. To take but one instance, a fire insurance policy is not assignable after loss, but the nature of a marine insurance contract is such as to require that marine insurance policies should be assignable even after loss. In the United Kingdom, assignability of marine insurance policies after loss is placed beyond doubt by S. 50 of the Marine Insurance Act. But in the absence of a similar provision here, it is doubtful if Courts in British India would hold that they are so assignable."[1]

2. Scope of the section.—This section provides for the transfer of a policy of marine insurance while S. 135A deals with the rights, etc., arising in consequence of such assignment of rights under a policy of marine insurance. A policy of marine insurance can be assigned either before or after loss by endorsement thereon or in any other customary manner unless it is expressly prohibited by the terms of the policy.

131. Every notice of transfer of an actionable claim shall be in writing, signed by the transferor or his agent duly authorized in this behalf, or, in case the transferor refuses to sign, by the transferee or his agent, and shall state the name and address of the transferee.

Notice to be in writing, signed.

Synopsis

2. Scope.
3. Notice by transferee or by his agent.
4. "Shall state the name and address of the transferee."
5. Notice with a condition or qualification.
6. Waiver of defects in the notice.

1. Legislative changes.—The corresponding section in Chap. VIII, as it stood before 1900 was S. 132 which ran as follows :

"Every such notice must be in writing signed by the person making the transfer or by his agent duly authorised in this behalf."

The section made no provision for a notice by the transferee and it was, therefore, held in the undermentioned case[1] that a notice sent by the transferee could not, under the terms of S. 131 (now S. 130), make the transfer of a debt operative. The change introduced by the present section seems to have been suggested by the decision of Farran, C. J., in Ragho v. Narayan.[2] His Lordship observed in that case:

"Before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, it was the assignee upon whom it was incumbent for his own protection to give notice of his assignment to the debtor. There was no particular reason why the assignor should give it. We cannot help thinking that there has been a slip made in S. 132 in throwing upon the person making the transfer the obligation of giving express notice to the debtor. The English Act 36 & 37 Vict. C.66, S. 25, only requires that express notice in writing shall be given. It does not enact who is to give it. It may even be given after the death of the assignor. (Walker v. Bradford Old Bank, 12 Q. B. D. 511.) But, however this may be (and the attention of legislature may well be directed to the point), we must construe the Act as it stands. No provision is made in it for the assignee giving notice in any particular way."

Regarding the change the Select Committee observed in their report :

"In S. 132 (now 131) we propose to enact that a notice of transfer shall be signed by the transferor, or his agent, or, in case of the transferor's refusal, by the transferee, and shall state the name and address of the transferee. The latter part of this rule goes beyond the requirements of the English law, but we submit that a notice in general terms, not stating the name and address of the transferee, would not be sufficient as a safeguard against fraud. A debtor is, we think, entitled to know the name and address of the person to whom he becomes liable on a transfer of the claim against him."

2. Scope.—This section deals with the form and essentials of the notice required to be given under S. 130. In order that the saving provision in the second paragraph of Sub-S. (1) may be operative, the requirements of this section must be strictly complied with.[1]

3. Notice by transferee or by his agent.—The transferee or his agent can sign the notice only if the transferor refuses to sign it.[1] The fact of such refusal need not be mentioned in the notice.[2] The section does not require that the debtor must have knowledge of the refusal by the transferor to sign, either from the notice or otherwise, in order that the debtor may be liable to the transferee. In the undermentioned case[3] where a notice was served by the transferee on the debtor and it was not proved that the transferor refused to sign the notice, it was held that a payment made by the debtor to the transferor was valid.

4. "Shall state the name and address of the transferee."—The notice must state both the name and address of the transferee. So where the notice states the name of the transferee but does not state his address the provisions of this section are not complied with and the notice is not effective to bring the exception mentioned in the proviso to Sub-S. (1) of S. 130 into operation.[1] Similarly, the name and address of the solicitor of the transferee cannot be substituted for the name and address of the transferee himself,[2] as the word "shall" in the section means the very same thing and not a substitute for it.[3]

5. Notice with a condition or qualification.—It has been held by the High Court of Madras[1] that a notice under this section will not be bad merely because it is coupled with a condition or qualification, provided the other requirements of the section are complied with. Thus, where the transferor, a contractor, in a notice to the debtor, a railway company, asked the company to pay to the transferee, one G, the amount due on his final bill when the bill would be ripe for payment in due course, unless in the meantime, the contractor had himself otherwise paid off the debt due by him to G, it was held that the notice, though conditional or qualified, was valid and the company, therefore, could not deal with the contractor after the receipt of the notice.

6. Waiver of defects in the notice.—Where the notice does not strictly comply with the provisions of this section and is defective in form a question arises, whether the debtor himself can waive the defects in a notice. It was observed by Mukerjee, J., in Sadasook Ramprotap v. Hoare Miller & Co.[1]:

> "The answer to the question whether it is permissible to waive a particular provision depends upon its true nature. If the object of the Legislature is to protect or benefit an individual litigant, it is open to him to waive the positive provisions of the statute. On the other hand, if the provision has been enacted from reasons of public policy, he cannot be permitted to waive it. The provisions of S. 131 fall, in my judgment, within the latter category, but I am not prepared to maintain as an abstract proposition of law, that under no conceivable circumstance can the provisions of S. 131 be waived by the debtor."

1. Legislative changes.—The corresponding section of the old Chapter VIII, section 137, ran as follows:

> Illustration.
> A debenture is issued in fraud of public company to A. A sells and transfers the debenture to B who has no notice of the fraud. The debenture is valid in the hands of B."

2. Scope of the section.—It is a general principle of law that no one can transfer to another a right or title greater than he himself has, the maxim being nemo plus juris ad alium transferee potest quam ipse habe.[1] It is also a principle of equity that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to all the equities which subsist against the assignor.[2] This section is based on the above principles.[3] and merely enacts the law as it existed before the Act was passed.[4] Other provisions of law in which the same principles are found enacted are S. 49 of the Code of Civil Procedure[5] and Ss. 231 and 232 of the Contract Act.

The section, of course, has no application where the transfer is not of an actionable claim, but of an interest in immovable property. Where the right to recover arrears of profits was assigned to a co-sharer in a conveyance of a village share and the cosharer sued the lambardar to recover the arrears, and the lambardar claimed to set off against the claim, amounts due to him, it was held that the right to recover the profits was an interest in immovable property and not an actionable claim, and that this action had no application to the case.[6]

3. Liabilities and equities.—Where no amount is due to the assignor the assignee can get nothing. Where only a portion of the debt is due, the assignee can get nothing more. Where the debtor is entitled to set off against the assigned debt another debt due to him, the assignee can, as the first illustration shows, take the assignment only subject to this right of set off.[1] A debtor can also claim as against the assignee a right of equitable set off.[2] Thus, where the debtor is entitled to claim unliquidated damages from the assignor arising out of the same transaction as the assigned debt, he can set off the same against the assigned debt, even as against the assignee.[3] Where A executes a bond in favour of B under circumstances in which it is voidable by A on the ground of undue influence, fraud, etc., the option of avoiding the bond is available not only against the original creditor but also his assignee.[4] This is, in fact, illustration (ii) to the section.

But the liability or equity must be existing at the time of the assignment. In Brice v. Bannister[5] G had contracted to build a ship for the defendant, to be paid for in four instalments. G owed money to the plaintiff, and, before the completion of the contract gave the plaintiff an order upon the defendant for the defendant to pay the plaintiff £100 out of the moneys due to G from the defendant. Notice was given of this to the defendant. The defendant, however, made subsequent advances to G to enable him to complete the contract, with the result that at the completion of the contract G had no more to receive on account of the contract. It was held that the advances made by the defendant to G, after notice of the assignment to plaintiff was not an equity existing at the date of the assignment and could not be set up against the plaintiff's claim for the amount assigned to him.

See also the undermentioned cases.[6]

4. Assignee need not be aware of the liability or equity.— The fact that the assignee of the actionable claim is not aware at the date of the assignment, of the existence of the liability or equity, does not, as the illustrations show, affect the rule that he takes it only subject to such liabilities or equities.[1] It is the duty of the assignee before he takes the assignment to make enquiries as to any equities or liabilities affecting the subject-matter of the assignment.[2] It is not the duty of the debtor to inform the assignee, on the receipt of notice of assignment, that the assignment is burdened with liabilities, unless there are circumstances leading him to think that the assignee is being defrauded and is likely to sustain further loss.[3]

5. Debtor may lose the benefit of the section by his own conduct.— A debtor may by his conduct be stopped from raising against an assignee an equity which would have availed him against the original obligee. Thus, where his conduct has been such that it may be regarded as representation that there were no equities affecting the subject-matter of the assignment, and the assignee has taken the assignment on the faith of such representation, he cannot set up the equity against the assignee.[1] Where the debtor, on receiving notice of the assignment, sees that the assignee has been deceived and stands by and allows him to be defrauded, he cannot be allowed to set up his equity against the assignee.[2]

6. Mortgage-debt.—See Note 18 on Section 130.

7. Assignment in execution of decree.—The principle of this section has been held applicable even where the transfer of the actionable claim is by way of sale in execution of a decree. Where A owed a debt to B, and B owed another debt to A and in execution of a decree against B, the debt due by A to B was sold and was purchased by C, it was held that in a suit by C against A to enforce the debt, A can set off the debt due by B to him.[1]

133. Where the transferor of a debt warrants the solvency of the debtor, the warranty, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, applies only to his solvency at the time of the transfer, and is limited, where the transfer is made for consideration, to the amount or value of such consideration.

Warranty of solvency of debtor.

Synopsis

1. Legislative changes.
2. Scope of the section.
3. "Debt," meaning of.
4. "Solvency" and "warranty" meaning of.
5. "In the absence of a contract to the contrary."

1. Legislative changes.—This section was originally numbered as S. 134 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. By Act II of 1900 certain amendments and alterations were effected in the chapter relating to actionable claims and this section was then numbered as 133 of the Act.

2. Scope of the section.—This section deals with a case of transfer of a debt accompanied by a warranty of the solvency of the debtor. It declares that, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the warranty will apply only to the solvency of the debtor at the date of the transfer and not to his continued solvency after the date of the transfer. It further declares that the liability under the warranty is limited to the extent of the consideration for the transfer, where the transfer is one for consideration.

Just as title to property is important in transfers of immovable property, and title to goods, in the sale of goods, the solvency of a debtor is important in the transfer of a debt. But while, in the case of immovable property[1] and of goods,[2] the law implies a warranty of title to the property or the goods as the case may be, there is no warranty by implication of the solvency of the debtor in the case of transfers of debts.

As to warranty in various other transfers of property, see the undermentioned provisions.[3]

3. "Debt," meaning of.—The word "debt" has not been defined in this Act or in the General Clauses Act. Wharton in his Law Lexicon, defines it as "a sum of money due from one person to another." In Webb v. Stenton,[1] Lord Justice Lindley defined it as a sum of money which is now payable or which will become payable in the future by reason of a present obligation.

The section speaks of the transfer of a debt and not of the transfer of an actionable claim. It is conceived, however, that the word debt must be taken to be a debt which is an actionable claim, inasmuch as the whole chapter in which this section occurs deals only with actionable claims.

See also section 3, note 22.

4. "Solvency" and "warranty," meaning of.—The "solvency" of a debtor means his ability to discharge all his debts and obligations in full.[1]

The term "warranty" is not defined in this Act. It has been held to be a stipulation collateral to the main purpose of a contract, the breach of which will give rise to claim for damages,[2] against the warrantor. Section 12, sub-s. (3) of the Sale of Goods Act which follows generally the English Sale of Goods Act[3] defines "warranty" as follows:

1. Section 55 (2).
2. Section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930.

3. (1893) 56 & 57 Victoria, Ch. 71, Section 62.

"A warranty is a stipulation collateral to the main purpose of the contract, the breach of which gives rise to a claim for damages but not to a right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated."

A warranty is in the nature of a guarantee though all the incidents of a contract of guarantee are not applicable to the case of a warranty. The liability of the transferor who warrants the solvency of his debtor is not co-extensive with that of the debtor as in the case of a guarantor. Further, the liability of the warrantor transferor arises on the date of the transfer itself, whereas the liability of a guarantor on the non-payment of the debt by the debtor.[4]

5. "In the absence of a contract to the contrary."—Parties can contract so as to create rights and liabilities other than those contemplated under this section. When they so contract, they will be bound by the terms of their contract and this section will not be applicable.

Under the English law, an implied convenant, on the part of the transferor, that he will not do anything in derogation of his transfer, will be presumed; thus, if a debt is rendered irrecoverable by any act of the transferor, subsequent to the transfer he will be held liable on the basis of a breach of such implied convenant.[1] He will, however, not be liable to pay the entire amount due under the debt transferred but only such amount as has been rendered irrecoverable.[2]

1. Legislative changes.—This section corresponds to S. 138 of the old Chap. VIII. That section ran as follows :

"When a debt is transferred for the purpose of securing an existing or future debt, the debt so transferred, if recovered by either the transferor or transferee, is applicable, first, in payment of the cost of such recovery; secondly, in or towards satisfaction of the amount for the time being secured by the transfer; and the residue (if any) belongs to the transferor."

2. Scope of the section.—It has already been seen in Note 3 on S. 130 that the word "transfer" in this chapter is wide enough to include a transfer by way of security also. This section deals with such cases[1] and provides for the mode of application of the amount of the transferred debt when it is received by the transferor or recovered by the transferee.

In cases of transfers of a book-debt for the purpose of securing a debt the transfer sometimes takes the form of an absolute assignment but it can be shown that the transfer was not absolute, but was intended to be merely by way of security.[2]

3. Transfer of a secured debt.—It has been seen in Note 22 on S. 3 that a debt separated from the security given therefor is a "debt" within the meaning of this Act. A claim to a debt is an "actionable claim" within the definition of that expression. It follows that where a debt is due to A from C and it is secured by pledge or hypothecation of C's property, A can transfer such a debt, separated from the security given therefor, to B in order to secure the debt which is due to him (B) by A; the result, in such a case, will be that though B will get no right or interest in the property of C which is hypothecated with A, he (B) will be entitled to the benefit of all the sums received by A from C in reduction of his own debt whether recovered from the secured property or otherwise.[1]

4. "Existing or future debt."—As to the meaning of this expression, see Note 13 on S. 58.

5. Rights and duties of the transferee.—After a debt is transferred by way of security, the remedy of the transferor as a creditor regarding the recovery of the debt passes to the transferee and what remains in the transferor is only the right to redeem the transferee.[1] Consequently, the transferor cannot proceed against his debtor,[2] and the only person who can sue for the recovery of the debt in his own name being the transferee himself,[3] it is his duty to use reasonable diligence to recover the debt from the debtor.[4] If he fails to do so owing to his own default he will be deemed to have recovered the amount and will not be allowed to claim it again from the transferor on the ground that he could not recover it.[5] The transferor can file a suit against the transferee for redemption and can get the debt re-assigned to him in which case he would be entitled to sue his debtor; or if the security is lost by reason of the transferee not enforcing it, the transferee could be sued for damages by the transferor for his default.[5a]

Where a charge is created on a debt by way of security it amounts to a transfer and the charge-holder can sue to recover the debt from the transferor's debtor.[6]

When the transferee brings a suit against the transferor's debtor for the recovery of his debt, he must implead the transferor as a party to the suit, so that the matter may be settled in his presence.[7]

6. "The residue, if any, belongs to the transferor or other person entitled to receive the same."—The residue remaining after the payment of the costs of recovery and the debt secured, belongs to the transferor. The reason is that when a debt is transferred by way of security only, the transferee does not become the absolute owner thereof. He becomes entitled to recover out of the transferred debt only the amount which is secured, the residuary interest being still left in the transferor[1] who can at any time pay off the debt due to the transferee and have the security released.[2]

Synopsis

3. "By endorsement or other writing."

1. Legislative changes.—There was no section corresponding to this in the old chapter VIII. It was introduced for the first time in this Act by the Transfer of Property Act (II of 1900) and was a re-enactment, with verbal alterations, of the provisions in S. 15 of the Policies of Insurance (Marine and Fire) Assignment Act (V of 1866) which was repealed. The reference to marine insurance policy has been omitted from the section by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act (VI of 1944), as the rules and principles governing a marine insurance policy are materially different from those governing a life insurance policy. Sections 130A and 135A inserted by the same Act now specifically provide for transfer of and assignment of rights under a policy of marine insurance. (See Note 1 under S. 130A.)

2. Scope.—A policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity. It is not an incident to the property insured, and does not pass, as such, with the transfer of the property to the transferee. In order that the latter should get the benefit of the policy it must be assigned to him by endorsement or other writing. In the undermentioned case[1] where A mortgaged certain property to B and then insured the same against fire it was held that B, who did not take an assignment of the policy, was not entitled to claim the insurance amount from the insurer, when the property was destroyed by fire. As to the right of a transferee of immovable property insured against fire, to claim the insurance money from his transferor, see S. 49 and notes thereon.

3. "By endorsement or other writing."—The word 'endorsement' means "anything written or printed upon the back of a deed or writing."[1] A policy of fire insurance can, therefore, be assigned by writing the words of transfer on the back of the policy, itself or by executing a separate document.

Assignment of rights under policy of marine insurance.

[a]135A. (1) Where a policy of marine insurance has been assigned so as to pass the beneficial interest therein, the assignee of the policy is entitled to sue thereon in his own name; and the defendant is entitled to make any defence arising out of the contract which he would have been entitled to make if the action had been brought in the name of the person by or on behalf of whom the policy was effected.

(2) Where the insurer pays for a total loss, either of the whole, or, in the case of goods, of any apportionable part, of the subject-matter insured, he thereupon becomes entitled to take over the interest of the insured person in whatever may remain of the subject-matter so paid for, and he is thereby subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the insured person in and in respect of that subject-matter as from the time of the casualty causing the loss.

(3) Where the insurer pays for a partial loss, he acquires no title to the subject-matter insured, or such part of it as may remain, but he is thereupon subrogated to all rights and remedies of the insured person as from the time indemnified by such payment for the loss.

(4) Nothing in clause (e) of section 6 shall affect the provisions of this section.

Synopsis

1. Legislative changes.
2. Scope of the section.
3. "Buy or traffic in . . . . actionable claim."
4. Legal practitioner.
5. This section does not apply to purchases in execution.

1. Legislative changes.—Section 136 of the old Chap. VIII for which this section was substituted by the Transfer of Property Act, II of 1900, ran as follows:

> "No Judge, pleader, mukhtar, clerk, bailiff or other officer connected with Courts of Justice can buy any actionable claim falling under the jurisdiction of the Court in which he exercises his functions."

2. Scope of the section.—This section prohibits a Judge, a legal practitioner or an officer connected with any Court of Justice from trafficking or dealing in any actionable claim[1] and further provides that an actionable claim so dealt with cannot be enforced in any Court.[2] The class of persons named hold a privileged position in the administration of justice and the law imposes on them certain restrictions and disabilities in order to safeguard the interests of the litigants and the pure administration of justice.[3] "It is of great importance in all countries and more particularly in a country like India" observed their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kerakoose v. Serte,[4] "that no officer of a Court of Justice should be even exposed to the suspicion, that in the discharge of his official duties his conduct may be influenced by any personal consideration."

The prohibition being absolute, any transfer in defiance of it, is void.[5]

The section as it now stands is wider in its scope than the section as it originally stood. The prohibition under the old section was restricted only to buying and in respect of those actionable claims, which fell under the jurisdiction of the Court in which the transferor exercised his functions. Under the present section, the prohibition extends to trafficking in, or stipulating for or agreeing to receive any share of or any interest in, any actionable claim, whether the claim is within the jurisdiction of the Court with which the transferor is connected or of any other Court. The view[6] under the old section, that a pleader or an officer who did not practise or exercise his functions in the Court by which the claim was cognizable, was not prevented from purchasing it, is no longer law.

This section may be compared to O.21 R. 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

3. "Buy or traffic in . . . . . actionable claim."—The prohibition under this section extends to buying, or trafficking in or stipulating for, or agreeing to receive any share of or interest in, any actionable claim. Thus, a sale[1] or an assignment by way of security[2] of an actionable claim to any of the persons named in the section comes within the prohibition and is therefore void. In the undermentioned case[3] where a Judge made a gift to his nephew, a Barrister, of his rights under the contract to purchase certain immovable property, it was held by the High Court of Lahore that there was no buying or trafficking in or stipulation for any share of or interest in an actionable claim.

The section does not prohibit a mere sale by any of the persons named.[4] The words "traffic in" may in certain circumstances include the transaction of sale, but it connotes something more than a mere sale.[5]

Where a pleader advanced money to the client on a usufructuary mortgage, for the purpose of paying off a redemption decree passed in the client's favour, it was held that the transaction of mortgage did not in any way amount to the taking of a transfer of an actionable claim.[6]

4. Legal practitioner.—The old section was limited to legal practitioners who were pleaders or mukhtars. This section is wider and includes all legal practitioners. The term "legal practitioner" has not been defined by this Act, or by the General Clauses Act. Section 3 of the Legal Practitioners Act, XVIII of 1879, defines it to mean, "an advocate, a vakil, or attorney of any High Court, a pleader, a mukhtar or revenue agent." It is conceived that the term "legal practitioner" in this Act will also include an advocate, a vakil, attorney of a High Court, a pleader, a mukhtar or revenue agent.[1]

A pleader's clerk,[2] however, is not disqualified from dealing in actionable claim.

5. This section does not apply to purchases in execution.—By virtue of S. 2 (d), this section does not affect transfers in execution of a decree. But by O. 21 R. 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure "no officer or other person having any duty to perform in connexion with any sale shall either directly or indirectly bid for, acquire or attempt to acquire any interest in the property sold." A purchase by a pleader of an actionable claim under a life insurance policy in execution of a decree is not vitiated by this section.[1]

Synopsis

1. Legislative changes.
2. Scope of the section.
3. Stocks and shares.
4. "Instruments which are for the time being, by law or custom, negotiable."
5. "Any mercantile document of title to goods."

1. Legislative changes.—The present section was substituted for S. 139 of the old Chap. VIII, by the Transfer of Property Act, II of 1900. The old S. 139 ran as follows:

"Nothing in this section applies to negotiable instruments."

Under the section as it now stands, the exemption is extended to stocks, shares or debentures and mercantile documents of title to goods.

2. Scope of the section.—This section provides that nothing in this chapter will apply to stocks, shares or debentures, or to instruments which are for the time being negotiable by law or custom or to any mercantile document of title. It enables the transfer of the things specified in the section, to be made otherwise than in the manner provided by S. 130 and the effect of such transfer is not controlled by the subsequent sections. Transfers of these things mentioned in the section have been provided for by special Acts of the Legislature or by the Law Merchant. Thus, the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, deals with the mode and the effect of the transfers of certain negotiable instruments such as promissory notes, bills of exchange and cheques. These instruments, though in themselves actionable claims within the meaning of S. 3 of the Act, are thus differentiated from other kinds of actionable claims by this section.

As seen in Note 3 on S. 4, this section, as it relates to contracts, forms part of the Indian Contract Act by virtue of section 4.

3. Stocks and shares.—In England a share is regarded as a chose in action.[1] It is not a chose in action in India.[2] A share is a moveable property within the meaning of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, and is transferable in the manner stated in that Act.[3] The Sale of Goods Act, 1930, also expressly includes shares in the definition of "goods" in that Act[4]. They have been exempted by this section from the operation of this chapter.

Under S. 2 (16) of the Indian Companies Act, "share" includes "stock". It has also been exempted by this section from the provisions of this chapter.

4. "Instruments which are for the time being, by law or custom, negotiable."

(A) "Negotiable Instrument"—Meaning of.

An instrument is negotiable when it is, by the custom of trade, transferable like cash by delivery, and is also capable of being sued upon by the person holding it pro tempore in his own name.[1] The two essentials of negotiability are (i) that the instrument is transferable like cash, merely by delivery, and (ii) that the person holding it is able to sue, in due course, in his own name.[1a] Thus, a bona fide transferee for value of negotiable instrument acquires a good title thereto, even though his transferor had none, just as a bona fide transferee of cash obtains a good title to it, although his transferor might have stolen it.[2] It has, therefore, been remarked that "negotiable" is a term which, perhaps should be strictly reserved for instruments which may give to a transferee a better title than that possessed by the transferor.[3] A negotiable instrument partakes of the nature of a contract also, as it contains either an order or promise to pay money.[4]

(B) Negotiable instruments under statutes.

The Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, deals as it states in its Preamble, only with promissory notes, bills of exchange and cheques, and such instruments are "negotiable" within the meaning of that statute when they are payable either to order or to bearer.[5]

(C) Negotiable instruments under custom or Law Merchant.

The Negotiable Instruments Act is, however, not exhaustive of all instruments which are negotiable. Apart from the instruments recognised by that Act as "negotiable," there are other instruments such as various kinds of hundis,[6] debentures payable to bearer,[7] or scrips or bonds,[8] which have been regarded as negotiable instruments by the custom of trade. Indeed, with the growth of the trade and wide expansion of commerce, new kinds of securities emerge and claim recognition from the Courts of law as negotiable instruments. These instruments owe their validity to the Law Merchant which is "nothing more nor less than the usages of merchants and traders in different departments of trade, ratified by the decisions of Courts of Law, which upon such usages being proved before them have adopted them as settled law, with a view to the interests of trade and public convenience".[9] In order to be included in the category of negotiable instruments, these instruments must possess the essentials stated above. Otherwise, they will not be recognised as negotiable instruments.[9a] Thus, a document of title to goods cannot be negotiable in the strict sense of the word as the endorsee of it does not get a better title than his assignor.[10] See also the undermentioned cases in which the instruments were held not to be "negotiable instruments".[11]

(D) Transfer of negotiable instruments.

The usual mode of transfer of a negotiable instrument is by endorsement or by delivery.[12] Such instruments, however, may be transferred otherwise than by negotiation.[13] What the Negotiable Instruments Act does is to prohibit negotiation except in the manner specified by it, but it does not prohibit assignment in any of the several ways allowed by law.[14] Negotiable instruments are actionable claims and as such they can also be transferred by assignment under S. 130.[15] The view, that they could be transferred only by endorsement or by delivery[16] is no longer good law.

The incidents, however, of a transfer by assignment and of a transfer by endorsement are different. In the former case, the assignee acquires all the right, title and interest of the assignor, while an endorsee is clothed with the rights and advantages of a holder in due course.[17] Similarly, in the former case the assignment being subject to the rules in Chap. VIII the transfer is subject to all the equities and liabilities to which the transferor was subject, while in the latter case it is not.[17a] The assignee, on the other hand, being an assignee of the debt, can sue all the persons liable for the debt, while an endorsee who gets only the property in the "instrument" by the endorsement, has merely the rights on the instrument and, therefore, can sue only the person whose name appears thereon.[17b]

(E) Railway receipt

A railway receipt is not a negotiable instrument unless by special custom.[18]

5. "Any mercantile document of title to goods."—Compare S. 2, sub-s. (4) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1930. In order that a document may be a "mercantile document of title to goods" it must be a document—

(a) which is used in business as proof of the possession or control of the goods, or

(b) which authorises or purports to authorise the possessor of the document to transfer or receive the goods thereby represented.[1]

A railway receipt,[2] a bill of lading,[3] delivery order,[4] dock warrant and warehousekeeper's certificate, are all illustrations of mercantile documents of title to goods. But a document called a "mate's receipt" by a shipping company, containing stipulations as to freight, carriage and other conditions appropriate to a bill of lading, was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council not to amount to a document of title to goods.[5] A railway receipt which provides for delivery of goods only to the consignee or his endorsee as his agent is not an instrument of title within the meaning of this section.[5a]

A document of title to goods represents the goods to which it relates, and the law governing its transferability is the same as the law which governs the transferability of the goods themselves.[6] The contract indicated by a railway receipt can be transferred without a writing. Such a transfer is regulated by custom.[6aa] The transfer of a railway receipt does not effect a transfer of the ownership of goods unless the instrument is negotiable by the custom of the trade.[6a] It has been held in the undermentioned case[6bb] that a transfer of a railway receipt can be made by endorsement in blank coupled with delivery of the document to the transferee where the intention is to make an absolute delivery carrying with it a right to the goods.

A bill of lading transferred by endorsement and delivery transfers ownership of the goods; no other documents, though they may be mercantile documents of title to goods, can transfer by mere assignment and delivery the ownership of the goods though they may transfer the right to receive the goods.[6b].

THE CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE, 1908.

SUITS RELATING TO MORTGAGES OF IMMOVABLE PROPERTY.

Parties to suits for foreclosure, sale and redemption.

R. 1. [New: Act IV of 1882, S. 85.] Subject to the provisions of this Code, all persons having an interest either in the mortgage-security or in the right of redemption shall be joined as parties to any suit relating to the mortgage.

Explanation.—A puisne mortgagee may sue for foreclosure or for sale without making the prior mortgagee a party to the suit; and a prior mortgagee need not be joined in a suit to redeem a subsequent mortgage.

[See Civil Procedure Code O. 1 Rr. 1, 3, 9, 10 and O.31 R. 1.]

1. Suits relating to mortgages.—This Order is new. It incorporates, with certain alterations, Ss. 85 to 90, 92 to 94, 96, 97 and 99 of the Transfer of Property Act of 1882 which dealt with the procedure governing suits relating to mortgages. The chief objects with which this Order was enacted were—

(1) To set at rest the conflict of decisions under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, as to whether an application for an order absolute after a preliminary decree for sale was an application in execution or was one in the 'suit' itself for a further decree. (It is now made clear that the application is for a further decree.)

(2) To put an end to the conflict of decisions as to the applicability of Art. 178 (now Art. 181) of the Limitation Act, to applications for orders absolute, in mortgage suits.(1) (It is now established that Art. 181 applies to an application for a final decree.)

(3) Under the Transfer of Property Act there was no provision for the passing of a final decree where payment was made in accordance with the preliminary decree. This omission has been rectified in this Order.

In suits relating to mortgages, Courts should be guided by the provisions of O. 34 and not by the English practice.(2) The High Court on its original side is also governed by these provisions.(3)

This Order provides for the frame of the suit relating to mortgages, for the decrees, preliminary and final, to be passed in such suits and generally for the substantive rights of the mortgagees to be satisfied in respect of their debts out of their mortgage securities.(3a)

The provisions of this Order are not exhaustive and there is nothing to debar the parties to a mortgage from contracting themselves out of the provisions of this Order and to settle by compromise the form of decree to be passed in suits on mortgage.(3b)

This order applies not only to 'mortgages' of 'immovable property' but also to charges(4): see R. 15. The provisions of this Order have no application to suits under S. 12 of the Redemption of Mortgages Act (Punjab Act II of 1913)(5) or to compromise decrees.(6) As to the applicability of this Order to mortgages of chattels, see the undermentioned cases.(7)

2. Transfer of Property Act, Section 85.—This rule corresponds to S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act; that section ran as follows :

"85. Subject to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, S. 437, all persons having an interest in the property comprised in a mortgage must be joined as parties to any suit under this chapter relating to such mortgage: Provided that the plaintiff has notice of such interest."

The following are material alterations—

(1) The words "all persons having an interest either in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption" have been substituted for the words "all persons having an interest in the property comprised in a mortgage."

(2) The words "provided that the plaintiff has notice of such interest" have been omitted.

(3) An Explanation has been added.

7 NOTE.—It will be noticed that the Order is entitled "Suits relating to mortgages of Immovable Property."
('33) 20 AIR 1933 Bom 51 (54, 55): 57 Bom 346 DB). (Order 34 Rule 14 applies only to mortgage of immovable property and not to mortgage of movable property.)
('32) 19 AIR 1932 Cal 524 (533): 59 Cal 667 (DB).
(Rules of O. 34 are based on well settled rules of equity which in absence of any statutory provisions to the contrary, should be applied in suits on mortgages of movable property as well—Rules of O. 34 as regards costs apply to such suits also.)

The omission of the proviso to S. 85 in the present rule shows that a person may be a necessary party to a mortgage suit though the plaintiff may not be 'aware' of that person's interest in the mortgaged property.(1) Cases under S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act bearing on the question of notice are only of academic interest now.(2)

The other effects of the changes introduced by the rule have been discussed in their proper places in the commentary on this rule.

3. Scope and object of the rule.—The object of the present rule as to joinder of parties in mortgage suits is to avoid multiplicity of suits.(1) The rule applies only to suits relating to mortgages (i.e., suits for sale, foreclosure or redemption) and to suits to enforce 'charges' but not to suits for 'ejectment'. (2) The rule does not 'prohibit' the joining of any party but merely lays down that all persons interested in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption should be made parties. (3) It is not necessary that all the persons having an interest in the mortgage security should be arrayed on the same side.(4) As to the applicability of the rule to proceedings under the United Provinces Encumbered Estates Act, see the undermentioned cases.(5)

4. "Subject to the provisions of this Code."—This expression has been substituted for the words "subject to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, S. 437" (now O. 31 R. 1) which occurred in the Transfer of Property Act, S. 85. Hence the present rule is subject not only to O. 31 R. 1 but also to other provisions of the Code, as, for instance, O. 1 R. 9(1) or O. 23 R. 3 (1a) or O. 30 (Suits by or against firms).(2)

5. " Persons having an interest either in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption."—Under S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act the plaintiff in a suit relating to a mortgage was bound to implead all persons having an interest in the " property comprised in a mortgage." This gave rise to a conflict of decisions. According to one view the words " property comprised in a mortgage " referred to the 'interest,' as distinguished from the 'physical property,' which the mortgagor was competent to transfer by way of mortgage at the date of the transaction.(1) In other words, according to this view, the plaintiff was not bound to implead any person who had no interest either in the 'mortgage security' or in the 'right of redemption.' The High Court of Allahabad,(2) on the other hand, held that the word "property" meant the 'physical property' mortgaged and that it was therefore necessary to implead all persons claiming interest in the property though they had no interest in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption. The present rule has adopted the former view and the Allahabad view is now no longer law.

All the High Courts were, however, agreed, even in cases coming under S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, that a person claiming adversely to the mortgagor and the mortgagee, i.e., a person claiming a 'paramount' title was not a necessary or a proper party to a suit relating to a mortgage.(3) The same principle has been held to apply under the present rule also.(4) Thus, a person impleaded as the legal representative of a deceased mortgagor cannot have a paramount title to the property, which he sets up adversely to the mortgagor.

determined in the suit.(5) A person who, in a redemption suit, claims the right of redemption in opposition to the plaintiff cannot be said to be claiming a title paramount to that of the mortgagor and the 'mortgagee' and may be a proper party to the suit.(6) The High Court of Madras(7) seems to draw a distinction between a suit for 'redemption' and a suit for the 'enforcement' of a mortgage and is inclined to hold that persons claiming the property adversely to the mortgagor and mortgagee can be joined as parties to a suit for redemption. But the judgments in these cases do not show why the general rule as to the exclusion of questions relating to paramount or adverse title from mortgage suits should not apply to suits for redemption. On the other hand, it has been held by the Patna High Court(8) that even in suits for 'redemption,' persons asserting a paramount title to the mortgaged property should not be joined as parties. Where a person asserting a paramount title to the property has been erroneously made a party to a suit relating to a mortgage, he should be discharged from the suit.(9) But an objection on the ground of the joinder of such a person is not one affecting jurisdiction but is only an 'irregularity' in the matter of the joinder of parties and can be cured under S. 99 of the Civil Procedure Code.(10) Where, therefore, a party allows the suit to go on and the Court adjudicates on his claim to paramount title, he will be bound by the decision and cannot subsequently contend that the question was not within the purview of the suit.(11) Moreover, the rule as to the exclusion of the person claiming paramount title is not an inflexible one and, in proper cases, persons asserting a paramount title to the property can be conveniently made parties to a mortgage suit and their claims can be adjudicated upon in such suit.(12) Thus, where the person claiming paramount or adverse title is in 'possession' of the mortgaged property and is likely to resist the claim of the plaintiff if the latter succeeds in the suit, it may be convenient to join him as a party so as to avoid a multiplicity of suits.(13) Similarly, where it is alleged that the person claiming paramount title is only a 'benamidar' for the mortgagor, he can be joined as a party to the suit and the question can be decided therein.(14) So also in the case of mortgage of joint family property by the manager of a joint Hindu family, the other members of the family, who are joined as defendants to a suit on the mortgage, can question the validity of the mortgage.(15)

Where a person is dismissed from a suit on a mortgage on the ground of his claiming a paramount title to the property, he cannot subsequently sue for redemption.(16) The decree passed in the suit from which he has been discharged does not bind him and cannot be executed against him by his ejectment.(16a)

The question whether a person other than one claiming a paramount title, may be made a party to a suit relating to a mortgage and whether the questions raised by him can be gone into in such suit will depend upon the applicability of the provisions of Orders 1 and 2 of the Civil Procedure Code thereto. As has been seen in Note 30 on O. 1 R. 10 of the A.I.R. Commentaries on the Code of Civil Procedure, 4th (1944) Edn., questions raised purely as between the plaintiffs or between the defendants 'inter se' and in which the opposite side is not concerned, are not "questions involved in the suit" and need not be gone into in the suit. Thus, in a suit on a mortgage in favour of a deceased person a person claiming the estate of the deceased mortgagee in opposition to the plaintiff is not a necessary party to the suit.(17) Similarly, where the plaintiff mortgagee dies and some of his legal representatives are brought on the record, a person who claims also to be another legal representative cannot be added as party on that ground only and allowed to raise questions purely between himself and the rival claimants 'inter se'.(18) It has also been held similarly that a question of the relative liability of each of several co-mortgagors cannot be gone into in a mortgage suit.(19)

6. Parties to a suit for foreclosure, sale or redemption.—As has been seen in Note 5, all persons having an interest in the mortgage security or in the right of redemption should be made parties to any suit relating to the mortgage. The interest should be one 'subsisting' at the time of the suit.(1) Thus the owner of a 'contingent' interest like that of a Hindu reversioner is not a necessary party to the suit.(2) Similarly, a transferee pending a suit on the mortgage is not a necessary party to the suit.(3)

The following persons are necessary parties as being interested in the mortgage security:

(1) The heirs and assignees of the mortgagee's interest.

(2) Co-mortgagees.(4)

The following persons are necessary parties as being interested in the equity of redemption:

(1) All persons mentioned in S. 91 of the Transfer of Property Act.(5)

As to the parties to suits, other than suits for redemption, foreclosure or sale, by or against mortgagors or mortgagees, see the undermentioned cases.(26)

7. Trustees, executors or administrators.—The rule is made "subject to the other provisions of the Code." This would include O. 31 R. 1, Civil Procedure Code, under which a trustee, executor or administrator in whom the property is vested can effectively represent the persons beneficially interested. The latter need not therefore be joined as parties to a suit relating to the mortgage.(1) But the Court has a discretion to join the beneficiaries in a proper case,(2) as for example when, in the case of an executor, the estate has been fully administered,(3) or in the case of a trustee or an executor, his interest is adverse to that of the beneficiaries.(4) In the case of joint trustees, however, all of them should be impleaded in any suit relating to the mortgage.(5)

8. Benamidar.—It is now well settled that a benamidar can sue or be sued in his own name and that this rule applies to mortgage suits also.(1) The real owner is not a necessary party to such a suit. The contrary view, held in the undermentioned cases,(2) is not good law. There is, however, no impropriety in adding the real owner as a party in proper cases.(3)

9. Sub-mortgagee.—Where a mortgagee creates a mortgage of his rights in favour of another, he is said to create a sub-mortgage. The sub-mortgagee is entitled to bring to sale the 'interest' of the sub-mortgagor in the mortgage,(1) and the original mortgagor is not a necessary party to such a suit.(2) Where the mortgagor is also made a party to the suit, the sub-mortgagee may sue for sale or foreclosure of the 'mortgaged property itself' in cases and in the circumstances which would have entitled the sub-mortgagor on the date of the sub-mortgage to claim that relief, for the purpose of working out his rights against the sub-mortgagor.(3) The mortgagor is not a necessary party to a suit for redemption by the sub-mortgagor against his sub-mortgagee,(4) though there is no impropriety in making him a party thereto.(5) In a suit for redemption by the mortgagor against his mortgagee, the sub-mortgagee, as being interested in the mortgage security is a necessary party.(6) But where the mortgagor, not having notice of the sub-mortgage, fails to implead him in such suit and pays off the mortgage amount to the mortgagee, the sub-mortgagee cannot, after that redemption, bring the right mortgaged to him to sale.(7) The reason is that he has only a terminable interest in the mortgage right of his sub-mortgagor and when that right has been legally terminated, his security so far is gone.

10. Prior mortgagees—Explanation.—Under section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act it was held in some cases that a prior mortgagee was a necessary party to a suit to enforce or redeem a puisne mortgage.(1) These cases have been superseded by the explanation to the present rule under which a prior mortgagee or his transferee is not a necessary party to a suit relating to a puisne mortgage.(2) But there is no prohibition against joining a prior mortgagee in such a suit,(3) and the equities of a particular case may even demand that he should be so made a party.(4)

Where a decree for sale is passed on foot of a puisne mortgage, without making the prior mortgagee a party to the suit, the rights of the prior mortgagee are in no way affected and the sale under the decree can only be subject to the prior mortgage.(5) Even if the prior mortgagee is made a party to the puisne mortgagee's suit he is not bound to assert his prior right, if 'no relief' is claimed against him and 'the priority of his right is not in any way impugned,' and the decree in the suit cannot affect his rights.(6) But where he is impleaded and his prior right impugned or sought to be postponed in any way, he is bound to assert his right under the prior mortgage. Otherwise, his right will be barred by constructive 'res judicata.(7) (See also under sub-heading "suits by puisne mortgagee against the mortgagor and the prior mortgagee" in Note 40 on S. 11 of the A. I. R. Commentaries on the Code of Civil Procedure, 4th (1944) (Edn.) When a prior mortgagee who has also purchased the equity of redemption and is in possession of the mortgaged property is made a defendant to a suit upon the puisne mortgage, the decree may direct the puisne mortgagee to redeem the prior mortgage before bringing the property to sale.(8)

A holds a first and a third mortgage on a property. B, the holder of the second, i.e., the intermediate mortgage, impleads A as a defendant to his suit on the ground that he is a 'third' mortgagee. A is not bound to set up his prior mortgage inasmuch as the prior mortgage is not impugned.(9) But he is not precluded from setting up the prior mortgage and if he so sets it up it should be adjudicated upon by the Court.(10) Where A's claim to the priority rests not on a prior mortgage in his favour but on the fact of his being 'subrogated' to the rights of a prior mortgagee by payment, he must assert the right to such priority on pain of being precluded by 'res judicata' from putting it forward in a subsequent suit.(11) The reason is that in such a case he fills only 'one role," viz., that of puisne mortgagee and must put forward all the defences open to him. Where, however, the puisne mortgagee 'admits' in the plaint the right of A to priority, it is not necessary that A should appear in Court and set up his rights under the prior mortgage.(12) As to whether a person holding two mortgages on the same property can sue on the later mortgage subject to his rights under the earlier mortgage, see Notes on section 67A of the Transfer of Property Act.

11. Mahomedan co-heirs.—Where a Muhammadan mortgagor or mortgagee dies leaving a number of heirs, the ordinary rule is that all the heirs should be made parties to a suit relating to the mortgage.(1) But it has been held that a failure to implead some of the heirs of a mortgagor is no ground for dismissing the entire suit and that the suit may be decreed so far as the shares of the heirs actually joined are concerned.(2)

Supposing that some of the heirs of a deceased Muhammadan mortgagor have not been joined as defendants to a suit to enforce the mortgage, will the decree passed in the suit be binding on all the heirs? This question arose in 'Khiarajmal' v. Daim.(3) In that case, one Nabibaksh was impleaded as a defendant to a suit by the mortgagee. Nabibaksh died pending the suit, leaving two widows, one minor son and one minor daughter as his heirs. The widows and the son alone were brought on the record as his legal representatives. It was held by the Privy Council that Nabibaksh's estate was fully represented in the suit, notwithstanding the omission to bring on record his minor daughter. But with reference to the estate of another person, Naurez by name, the Privy Council held in the same case, that the impleadment of only one of his heirs was not sufficient to make the estate of Naurez represented in a suit to enforce payment of a debt due by Naurez. The question arose in the following circumstances. Naurez died before the suit was instituted, leaving a widow and four children including a son, Amirbaksh, a minor. Only Amirbaksh by his guardian, his uncle, Alahnawaz, was joined as a defendant to the suit. In holding that the estate of Naurez was not represented for the purpose of the suit, their Lordships observed as follows:

> " Amirbaksh was, of course, one of the heirs of Naurez, but in no other sense his legal representative. It is not pretended that Alahnawaz was in any legal sense or in fact his guardian, or was even appointed his guardian 'ad litem'.....The Indian Courts have properly exercised a wide discretion in allowing the estate of a deceased debtor to be represented by one member of the family, and in refusing to disturb judicial sales on the mere ground that some members of the family, who were minors, were not made parties to the proceedings, if it appears that there was a debt justly due from the deceased, and no prejudice is shown to the absent minors. But these are usually cases where the person named as defendant is 'de facto' manager of a Hindu family property, or has the assets out of which the decree is to be satisfied under his control."

It would appear from the decision taken as a whole and in the light of the remarks quoted above (see the last clause in the passage quoted) that in their Lordships' view, even in the case of Mahomedan co-heirs (to whom considerations applicable to Hindu joint families may not apply) if one of the co-heirs is in possession of the property of the deceased liable to be proceeded against, a decree passed against him alone would bind the entire estate. The undermentioned decisions(4) fall within this principle. The decisions cited below(5) in which it was held that although the heir who was sued was in possession of the property proceeded against, the other heirs would not be bound by the decree against him, do not appear to lay down good law in view of the Privy Council decision. Similarly, decisions holding in unqualified terms that a decree passed in a suit impleading as a defendant only one of the heirs of the deceased would bind the whole estate(6) also do not appear to lay down correct law. In the undermentioned decisions(7) it was held that the heir who had not been impleaded was not bound by the decree passed against one of the heirs alone; but it is not clear whether the heir who was sued was in possession of the assets of the deceased.

12. Joint Hindu family.—There is a conflict of decisions as to whether, in a suit by or against the manager of a joint Hindu family to enforce or redeem a mortgage, the other members of the family are necessary parties in the sense that their interests will not be bound if they are not individually joined as parties. On the one hand, it has been held by the High Courts of Madras(1) and Patna(2) and in several cases of the other High Courts(3) that in such a case the manager effectively 'represents' the other members of the family and that the latter cannot impugn the proceedings as not binding on them merely on the ground of their not having been individually made parties to the suit. But in many other decisions,(4) it has been held that the other coparceners are necessary parties to the suit and that their interests cannot in any way be affected by the result of the suit. In this connection, the undermentioned decisions of the Privy Council should be referred to.(5) In 'Kishan Prasad' v. 'Har Narain(6), it was held that the manager of a joint Hindu family business effectively represents the family in all litigation by or against the family in connection with the joint family business. In 'Sheo Shankar' v. 'Jaddo Kunwar',(7) the Privy Council observed as follows :

> "There seems to be no doubt upon the Indian decisions from which their Lordships see no reason to dissent) that there are occasions, including foreclosure actions when the managers of a joint Hindu family so effectively represent all other members of the family that the family as a whole is bound."

In 'Ganpat Lal' v. 'Bindbasini Prashad,'(8) a minor coparcener sued for a declaration that his right to redeem a mortgage was unaffected by a sale under a decree passed against the manager without impleading him (the minor) as a party. Their Lordships rejected that claim holding that, after the purchase under his decree, the mortgagee was in the position of a purchaser and that unless the sale and the decree were attacked in a properly constituted suit, his possession could not be disturbed. In 'Lingan Gowda' v. 'Basan Gowda,'(9) the Privy Council held that S. 11, Explanation VI of the Civil Procedure Code was applicable to a joint Hindu family. In view of the foregoing decisions of the Privy Council, the Madras and Patna view must be accepted as correct. See also Note 61 on S. 11 of the A.I.R. Commentaries on the Code of Civil Procedure, 4th (1944) Edn. Even granting that the son is a necessary party to a suit against the father, where he is impleaded as a legal representative of his father, he cannot object to the decree in the executing Court, on the ground of the plaintiff's failure to implead him.(10) Nor does the plaintiff mortgagee lose his right to sue the son separately by his failure to join him in the suit against the father.(11)

On the question whether in a suit by or against the manager of a joint Hindu family the manager should be 'expressly' and 'specifically' stated as suing or as being sued in his representative capacity as manager, there is a conflict of decisions, some cases holding that such express mention is not necessary,(12) and others holding that it is.(13) The better view, it is submitted, is that the question whether a manager sues or is sued in a representative character, is a question of fact in each case and his specific description as manager is not essential.

Although it may not be legally necessary to implead the other coparceners in a suit by or against a manager, yet, they would be 'proper' parties to such a suit.(14) Further, the right of the other coparceners to object, not on the ground of their non-joinder, but on the ground of the debt being not binding on them, or as being tainted with illegality or immorality, is not affected by proceedings to which they have not been parties.(15) But in a suit on a mortgage of joint family property where the 'manager' is not made a party, 'all' the other members are necessary parties.(16) Similarly, where the father is impleaded but he does not, or cannot, act in a representative character, the other members should be joined if their interests are sought to be affected.(17)

To a suit against the members of a Mitakshara joint family for the enforcement of a mortgage, the mother is not a necessary party.(18) To a suit to enforce the mortgage of the share of one coparcener alone, the other coparceners are not necessary parties.(19) Similarly, where the mortgage is not a 'joint family transaction' but one entered into by a member of the family in his 'individual' capacity, the other members are not necessary parties.(20)

Where the parties are not governed by Hindu law, and the son, under the customary law, is entitled only to a reversionary interest for the protection of which he has the right to interfere to prevent unnecessary alienations of the property, the son's interest is not suffiicent to entitle him to be made a party to a suit on the mortgage.(21)

the suit is a necessary party to a suit relating to the mortgage. (1) But a person having merely a 'raiyati' interest in the land is not entitled to redeem a mortgage or to be joined as a party to a suit on the mortgage. (2)

16. Landlord.—Although the general rule is that a person claiming a paramount title is not a necessary party to a suit on the mortgage, yet in some cases, it may be convenient to join the landlord of the mortgagor as a party thereto. (1) (See Note 5.) Where the landlord is in possession of the mortgaged property not by virtue of a supreme title but by virtue of a title improperly and collusively obtained from the tenant under a decree for ejectment, he is a necessary party to the suit on the mortgage. (2)

17. Kanomdar.—In an appeal by sub-tenants against a decree for redemption of a 'kanom' obtained by a 'jenmi', the 'kanomdar' is a necessary party. (1) Where a 'melcharathdar' along with the 'jenmi' obtains a decree for the redemption of a 'kanom, and the 'kanomdar appeals against the decree, claiming compensation for improvements, the 'jenmi' is a necessary party to the appeal.(2)

18. Parties to Appeal.—The provisions of this rule apply also to appeals. (1)

19. Effect of non-joinder.—Under section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, it was held that the word "must" in that section was imperative in character, and that, consequently the failure to join a person interested in the mortgaged property as a party to the suit was a defect fatal to the suit. nexion reference may also be made to S. 99 of the Civil Procedure Code which lays down that a misjoinder (which includes non-joinder) is not, in itself, a ground for reversing or varying a decree.(7)

Where in a mortgage suit, some of the persons interested in the equity of redemption have not been impleaded, under the principles discussed above, the entire suit need not be dismissed but may be decreed so far as the shares of the persons actually on the record are concerned. But is the mortgagee entitled to a decree for the entire mortgage amount or only to an amount which is proportionate to the shares of the parties actually on the record? On this question, there is a conflict of decisions. The Patna High Court (8) and the Calcutta High Court in the undermentioned decision (9) have held that the mortgagee is entitled to a decree for the entire mortgage amount though the Calcutta High Court held a contrary view in other decisions. (10) It is submitted that the former view is correct in principle as the mortgagee is entitled to realize his dues from any portion of the mortgaged property.

But, although, the non-joinder of persons who ought to have been joined as parties under this rule is not fatal to the suit, the result of this cannot 'in any way affect' the rights and liabilities of such persons. (11) Simple as this proposition is, its application to the complicated facts arising in mortgage suits has been the subject of a great diversity of judicial opinions. In order to appreciate the various views properly, it is necessary to remember the following important principles:

(1) Where an owner C mortgages his property to A by way of a 'simple' mortgage, the mortgagee gets nothing more than a right to obtain after objection by other side—Court cannot join them as parties—In appeal mortgagee offering to join—Held, offer came too late.)] from the Court an order that the property be sold for the recovery of the debt. The morgagor, retains in himself:

(a) a right to redeem the mortgage, and

(b) a right to the physical possession and enjoyment of the mortgaged property. (12)

(2) Where the mortgage is a usufructuary one, A will get a right to be in possession of the property until his debt is discharged, and C will retain only the right to redeem.

(3) Where C, the mortgagor, sells his interest in the property to D, then, if the mortgage is a simple one, D gets C's rights, Viz., the right to redeem and right to possession of the mortgaged property; if the mortgage is a usufructuary one, he will get only the right to redeem the mortgage.(13)

(4) Where C, after creating a mortgage in favour of A, creates a further mortgage in favour of B, then,

(1) if the mortgage is a simple one,

(i) B will get—

(a) a right to redeem the prior mortgage, and

(b) a right to obtain from the Court an order that the property be sold subject to the prior mortgage, for the recovery of his debt.

(ii) C will retain the right to redeem both the mortgages 'plus' the right to possession (2) if the mortgage is a usufructuary one, B will be entitled to a right to redeem the prior mortgage and a right to the possession of the property; and C will be entitled only to a right to redeem both the mortgages.

(5) Where C makes several mortgages successively in favour of different persons, the later mortgagee is entitled to redeem the earlier one, but the earlier ones cannot redeem the later ones, according to the maxim "redeem up and foreclose down."(14)

14 See Section 94 of the Amended Transfer of Property Act.

The various classes of cases illustrating the application of the above principles can now be considered—

(i) C executes a simple mortgage in favour of A and then sells his interests in the mortgaged property to D. A files a suit on his mortgage against C without impleading D, and, in execution of the decree obtained therein, purchases the property himself. Being obstructed by D in the possession proceedings A sues D for possession. Is the suit maintainable? No. (15) The reason is that D, not having been made a party in A's suit on the mortgage, is not affected in any way by the decree and execution proceedings in such suit, and his right to possession cannot be disturbed. On the same principle, if D is dispossessed by A in execution, he can, in a suit by him against A, recover back possession unconditionally.(16) There is no difference in principle, in this respect, even if D is a purchaser of C's interest in execution of a money decree against him, instead of under a private transfer. (17) The remedy of A in such cases would be to file a fresh suit on his mortgage against D. (18) He cannot, however, bring a fresh suit where his claim on the original mortgage is barred by limitation. (19)

It was, however, held in the undermentioned cases (20) that the result of not impleading D or other person entitled to be in possession would be to make the decree so obtained ineffectual only against the right of 'redemption' vested in such persons, so that A would be entitled to possession against them subject to their right of redemption. It is submitted that this view is not correct. D has got not only a right of redemption but a 'right to the possession' of the property as well. A decree to which he was not a party cannot effect him even in respect of the latter right. But this principle will not apply in the case of an English mortgage as under such a mortgage the 'mortgagee' is entitled to possession and this right will pass to the purchaser under the mortgage decree and prevail over the right of a person who has acquired an interest in the mortgaged property 'after' the creation of the mortgage and thus has obtained no right to possession in virtue of such interest. (21)

(ii) The principles stated in class (i) will equally apply to cases where D, instead of being a purchaser of C's interest, is a usufructuary mortgagee in possession. (22)

(iia) The above principles will apply also where D is a person who becomes entitled to the equity of redemption by adverse possession (22a).

(iib) But where the acquisition of title by D whether by transfer or by adverse possession takes place pending a suit on the mortgage in A's favour the doctrine of 'lis pendens' will apply and D will be bound by the decree in the suit although he is not joined as a party to it (22 b)

(iii) C executes simple mortgages first in favout of A and then in favour of B. B sues on his mortgage without impleading A and, in execution of the decree obtained therein, purchases the property in court-auction and enters into possession. 'Thereafter' A sues on his mortgage without impleading B and purchases the same property in execution of his decree. It will be seen that, at the time of the suit by A the right to redeem and the right to possession of the property, being already vested in B, cannot be affected by A's suit to which he was not a party. It follows that A cannot maintain a suit for 'possession' against B (23) or a suit for 'possession subject to redemption' by B. (24) He can, however, bring a fresh suit for sale on his mortgage against B, provided of course, that on the date of such suit, the claim on the morthgage is not barred by limitation. (25)

(iv) C executes simple mortgages first in favour of A and then in favour of B. A obtains a decree upon his mortgage without impleading B and in execution thereof purchases the property himself and obtains possession. B 'thereafter' files a suit on his mortgage, purchases the same property in execution of his decree and then sues A for 'possession'. Does the suit lie? No. (26) The reason is that at the time of B's suit on the mortgage the right to redeem and the right to possession having both already vested in A, the latter cannot be affected by anything done in B's suit. B has, however, two remedies open to

(v) J mortgages with possession certain property to G but the latter allows him to remain in possession under a rent deed executed by him. Then J purports to mortgage the same property to S with possession. Thereafter G obtains a decree for sale on foot of his mortgage and purchases the property himself in execution of the decree. To the suit in which this decree is obtained, S is not made a party. When G attempts to obtain possession, he is resisted by S who is in possession. Thereupon G brings a suit against S for possession. G is entitled to succeed in the suit as the mortgage conferred on him the right to possession and therefore S could not get any right to possession from J the mortgagor under 'his' mortgage. (35) As seen already, an 'English' mortgagee is similarly entitled to possession and this right is not affected merely because a subsequent transferee of the mortgaged property is not impleaded as a party to the suit on the mortgage.

(vi) C makes a mortgage in favour of A. Thereafter, in execution of a money decree against C, the mortgaged property is attached and sold and is purchased by D. Pending the attachment, A purchases by private sale the property from C in satisfaction of the mortgage and enters into possession. In a suit by D against A for recovery of possession, can A set up his mortgage as a "shield" as a defence to the suit? No. (36) The reason is that the private purchase of A pending attachment is void against all claims of D arising under the attachment and does not convey the equity of redemption to A. The prior mortgage can be used as a shield only for the purpose of protecting a possession 'to which the person setting it up has become lawfully entitled', and since in the case above referred to, A had no valid title to such possession as against D, he cannot use his prior mortgage as a shield in D's suit to recover possession. But the prior mortgagee can sue the auction-purchaser on the mortgage. (37)

(vii) C executes simple mortgages first in favour of A and then in favour of B. A sues C on his mortgage without impleading B. B also institutes a parallel suit on his own mortgage without impleading A. A purchases, 'pending' B's suit, the mortgaged property in execution of his decree, and thereafter B purchases the same property in execution of his decree. If the doctrine of 'lis pendens applies to the case, then A's purchase cannot take effect as against B's and therefore B will be entitled to possession as against A; A's remedy will then be to file a fresh suit for sale against B.(38) Further, on the analogy of the principle stated in class (vi) above, A not being 'entitled' to possession cannot hold up his prior mortgage as a shield against B's suit for possession. The undermentioned cases, (39) however, while holding that the doctrine of 'lis pendens applies to such cases, have nevertheless come to the conclusion that A can get a decree for possession 'subject to redemption by' B. of Allahabad has, in the undermentioned Full Bench case, (40) held that the doctrine of 'lis pendens' applies to such cases but has in a somewhat contrary manner come to conclusions which can only follow on the basis that the doctrine does 'not' apply. Thus, it has formulated the following conclusions:

If a sues B as plaintiff for possession, then,

(1) If he was the earlier purchaser, (i. e., purchaser pending B's suit) in point of time, he can redeem B and recover possession even though his (A's) mortgage is barred by time;

(2) If he is the later purchaser (i. e., if B's purchase is pending A's suit) then his suit even for redemption cannot be decreed.

If B sues A as plaintiff for possession, then,

(1) If B is the earlier purchaser in point of time, he must redeem A and A cannot compel B to submit to redemption by him;

(2) If B is the later purchaser in point of time he must first redeem A but A will have the right to redeem B next and retain possession. (40 a)

The High Courts of Madras (41) and Calcutta (42) have held that the doctrine of 'lis pendens' does not apply to legal proceedings to enforce mortgages and that therefore a sale in pursuance of a mortgage decree, the mortgage having been executed before the institution of the suit, is not affected by the doctrine of 'lis pendens'. According to this view the 'first' purchaser will be entitled to possession as against the later purchaser, a result, which is practically the same as that of the Full Bench case of the Allahabad High Court referred to above. (See also A. I. R. commentaries on the Civil procedure Code, S.65, Note 14 and the Transfer of Property Act, section 52.)

In the principles discussed in the several classes of cases considered above, there is no distinction between the case of a mortgagee purchaser and a stranger purchaser, as can be seen from an examination of the case above referred to.

When the puisne mortgagee, who has not been impleaded in a suit on the prior mortgage, seeks to redeem a prior mortgage, it was held before the Transfer of Property Act was passed that he should pay the amount due under the prior 'mortgage' without any reference to the 'decree' that was passed in the suit on the prior mortgage. (43) But S. 89 of the said Act provided that when once a final decree was passed on a mortgage the mortgage security and the right to redeem were both 'extinguished' with the result, that thereafter the rights of the parties fell to be determined on the basis of the decree. (44) Even subsequent to the Transfer of Property Act the earlier view is adopted in many cases. (45) In O. 34 R.5 which has taken the place of S.89 of that Act the words as to the mortgage security being extinguished have been omitted. The result now is the same as was held by the decisions prior to the Transfer of Property Act, namely, that the puisne mortgagee seeking to redeem the prior mortgagee should pay the amount due under the prior 'mortgage' and not merely the amount due under the 'decree' thereon.(46) (See also O. 34 R. 5, Note 13.) He is not, however, bound to pay for any 'improvements' made by the purchaser. (47) Where a puisne mortgagee is 'impleaded in a suit to enforce a prior mortgage, and a decree for sale or foreclosure is passed on the mortgage the effect is to extinguish his security if he does not exercise his right of redemption or his security is not expressly saved. (48) It was held in the undermentioned case (49) that the puisne mortgagee is not entitled, in such a case, to insist that the mortgagor should redeem 'his mortgage' also, his cause of action being altogether different from that of the prior mortgagee. Similarly, it was held that if the puisne mortgagee pays off the prior mortgage, he cannot apply for an order absolute for the amounts of 'both' the mortgages. (50) But the said cases are of doubtful authority now, since express provision is made in
